Harry Schwartz passed away peacefully on Sunday, October 12, 1997, at 3:45 pm, at Peterborough Civic Hospital. He leaves a loving family, his 3 daughters, Faye, Myrna, and Rochelle; his son-in-law, Dr. Edgar Singer, and 4 grandchildren: Pinchus, and Sara-Eta, and Anna and Jonathan, and beloved deceased wife, Edythe, his dear sister, Bessie, and Libby and Faigai and Monty, and all their children, and other relatives. He was a learned man who devoted his life to good causes, strong tradition, and inspired leadership. In and for the synagogue, and kindness to all. He will be missed by many, both in the business world and in the community. Harry Schwartz was a mason and a shriner; and past president of Beth Israel Synagogue, and B'nai Brith, and it's treasurer for 50 yrs. He devoted much of his entire life to the Jewish community in Peterborough, and was the inspiration and the guiding force behind the creation of the present synagogue. Harry Schwartz lived his life with tradition and honor. He was charitable to all. He was a business man who owned his own clothing store- The Co-ed Shop for 38 yrs. He was a quiet man, he was a humble man; but he was also a practical, proud and sophisticated man, with a wonderful sense of humour. We will all miss him. The funeral was held on Tuesday, October 14, 1997 at 1 pm at Beth Israel Synagogue, Peterborough. Shiva was held at 1499 Glencairn Ave., Tues. & Wed. until sundown.

ROSENHEK, Moses Aaron - Suddenly, on Saturday, October 4, 1997, in Quebec City. Moe, beloved husband of Regina Vinegar. Dear father and father-in-law of Shaul and Esther, and Felix and Joanne. Dear brother and brother-in-law of Dr. Clarence and Doris Rosenhek. Loving grandfather of Adam, Holly, Ashley, Joshua, Benjamin, Daniel, Zachary, Gabriel, and Akiva. He will also be missed by his nieces, nephews and many friends. A funeral service was held on October 6. Interment, Beth Israel Cemetery, in Quebec City. Shiva was observed at 2693 Morgan, Ste. Foy, Quebec, G1W-4R9. Memorial donations may be made to the Beth Israel Cemetery Memorial Fund.

Swiss firms 'blocking' access

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERN — Officials with the international panel of historians probing Switzerland's wartime past are complaining that some Swiss companies are refusing access to records dating back to the Nazi years.

The companies are "refusing to open their archives because they are afraid of compensation claims," according to one member of the Independent Commission of Experts, also known as the Bergier Commission, after its chair, historian Jean-Francois Bergier.

The international panel of historians was created by Switzerland last December to study the extent of the country's financial dealings with the Nazis.

Difficulties arose, according to members of the panel, when they attempted to investigate the operations of Swiss subsidiaries that operated in Nazi Germany. Some Swiss companies, they said, maintained that the commission had no legal authority to investigate the companies' subsidiaries.

Panel members cited the chocolate manufacturer Nestle as an example, saying the company refused to cooperate when the commission sought records about its Maggi subsidiary, which employed thousands of war prisoners and Jewish slave laborers at its factory located in Germany near the Swiss border.

"We are in a very delicate situation," said Linus von Castelmur, a historian who serves as secretary-general of the commission. "These records are absolutely necessary to investigate our history."

In a related development, some Swiss legislators are seeking to block parliamentary approval to provide additional funding for the commission's activities.

The Federal Council, as the Swiss cabinet is known, has called on Parliament to approve $11.5 million to cover the commission's operating costs during the next four years.

But some legislators want to block this funding, a move that would force the Bergier Commission to stop its activities by end of the year.

Slovenia shul rededicated

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MARIBOR, Slovenia — Five hundred years after Jews were expelled from what today is Slovenia, ceremonies were held here to rededicate the local synagogue.

Earlier this month, a mezuzah was nailed to the synagogue doorpost during a small ceremony that was held after a two-day international symposium titled, Medieval Jewish Communities in Central Europe and their Cultural Heritage.

"In the name of the Jewish community of Slovenia, I want to express thanks that we have lived to see this day and that we will work together with the city of Maribor and all people who are trying to preserve this synagogue as a living monument," said Mladen Svarc, coordinator of the Slovenian Jewish community, which numbers less than 100.

With work still to be completed on the synagogue, the mezuzah was taken down after the blessing was recited.

"It's just temporary and symbolic for now, as the synagogue is currently undergoing restoration, but we hope that when the work is complete, the mezuzah will be affixed here permanently," said Washington-based lawyer Mark Cohen, who brought the mezuzah to Maribor, which is located near the northern border of this former Yugoslav republic.

Cohen, who taught law at Maribor University several years ago, brought the mezuzah on behalf of the United States Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad, and Preserving Tolerance Inc., a private foundation.

The commission documents and preserves Jewish and other cultural heritage sites in Europe. Last year, in accordance with an agreement with the Slovenian government, it carried out a survey of all Jewish monuments in Slovenia.

The Maribor synagogue dates back to the 13th century and is one of the oldest buildings in the town.

Jews flourished in Maribor in the Middle Ages, and Maribor Rabbi Israel Isserlein was renowned throughout central Europe in the 15th century.

Jews were expelled from Maribor in 1497, and the synagogue was turned into a church in 1501. In the 19th century it was used as a warehouse and later as a dwelling.

City officials want to restore the synagogue for use as a cultural centre that would include an information centre on local Jewish history.

The symposium was the first full-scale international conference on a Jewish topic to be held in the town and was considered a prestigious local event.

Scholars and experts from Slovenia, Israel, Italy, Germany, Austria, Hungary and the United States presented papers.

Few of the participants in the symposium were Jewish.

Jewish major leaguers missed out on playoffs

By HARLAN C. ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — When Hall of Fame pitcher Sandy Koufax said he wouldn't pitch in the 1965 World Series because it conflicted with Yom Kippur, it made headlines.

If the Los Angeles Dodgers had made it into this season's playoffs and pitcher Scott Radinsky had decided not to pitch because of his religion, it might have rated a paragraph at most. After all, the decision of a somewhat anonymous relief pitcher doesn't rate with that of a World Series starter.

Because of the lateness of the High Holy Days this year, Radinsky and the other Jewish major leaguers did not have to make any decisions about playing on the holidays – their seasons were already over.

Still, 1997 was satisfying for Radinsky, outfielder Shawn Green of the Toronto Blue Jays, catcher Jesse Levis of the Milwaukee Brewers and pitcher Andrew Lorraine of the Oakland A's, less so for pitchers Jose Bautista and Allen Levine.

Scott Radinsky

Radinsky was the subject of a feature story in Sports Illustrated that focused on his recovery from Hodgkin's disease, which cost him the entire 1994 season, and his musical talents, which included recording CDs with his bands Ten Foot Pole and Pulley.

A left-handed relief pitcher whose fast ball is consistently in the 90 mph range, Radinsky was called "the toughest left-hander I've ever faced" by superstar Ken Griffey Jr.

He posted 5-1 records in both 1996 and '97 as a set up man and sometimes as a closer in the late innings of a game.

A California native, Radinsky began his career in the White Sox chain in 1986. In 1990, he made the huge jump from Class A ball to the major leagues, the first player to do so since Dwight Gooden in 1984.

Over six seasons with the Sox, he posted a 24-16 record. Last year, with the Dodgers, he allowed a run in just nine of 57 games he pitched.

Shawn Green

Green, who turns 25 on Nov. 10, had a solid major league season. His .287 batting average was highest among all the Blue Jays and his 16 home runs and 13 stolen bases were career highs for the three-year veteran.

A California native and a first round draft selection, Green also scored 21 doubles, three triples and 53 ribbies. He tied the major league record with two assists from the outfield in one inning; tied the Jays' record for put-outs by an outfielder with nine in one game; tied the Jays' club record for a hitting streak by a rookie (14 games in 1995); he set a club rookie mark that year with 31 doubles, 50 extra base hits and a .509 slugging percentage, which made him the only rookie to lead the team in slugging percentage.

If the Blue Jays keep improving as a team and Green can conquer his early-season batting problem, he has the potential to become an all-star.

Blue Jays' slugger Shawn Green

Jesse Levis

Milwaukee was a threat to make the playoffs for much of the '97 season and Levis, in his second full season in the big leagues, was a definite asset.

Although he won't have enough at-bats to be listed in the official season summaries, his .278 average was one of the best for the Brewers and a giant leap up from last year's .236.

Levis set a team record for pinch hit at-bats with 45, but stroked only 11 hits, a drop from last season when he had a .306 average as a pinch hitter.

A native of the Philadelphia area and a third-team All-American at the University of North Carolina, Levis originally was signed by the Cleveland Indians, who traded him to the Brewers last April for pitcher Jared Camp.

During his seven minor league seasons in the Indians' chain, Levis, 27, hit .364 for Colorado Springs in 1992 and .311 with the Buffalo Bisons in 1995.

Jose Bautista

The son of a Russian mother – whose family fled Europe for the Dominican Republic – and a Dominican father, Bautista is married to Lea Robichek, a Jewish woman from Caracas, Venezuela.

In 1981, Bautista made his professional debut at the age of 16 with the New York Mets' team in Kingport, Tenn.; he was drafted by Baltimore in 1988, dropped by them and signed by Kansas City for the 1992 season. From there, he moved to the Cubs, where he had his best season (10-3, 2.82 ERA) as both a starting and a relief pitcher.

Then he was released again after an elbow injury, signed by San Francisco (6-8 over two seasons), dropped by them and signed by Detroit prior to the '97 season. With the Tigers, Bautista had only a 2-2 record and his ERA soared to 8.59 before he was waived and signed by the St. Louis Cardinals.

Now 33, the right-handed reliever may be nearing the end of his career.

Allen Levine

Levine and Lorraine are both young pitchers who spent part of the season in the "bigs" and part in AAA ball.

Levine played in 24 games for the White Sox, posting a 2-2 record and a 7.11 ERA and didn't fare any better when sent down to Nashville, where he was 1-1 with a 7.13 ERA.

In 25⅓ major league innings, he gave up 33 hits, 21 runs, walked 15 and struck out 18. In AAA, he was touched for 58 hits and 32 runs in 35⅔ innings, walked 11 and whiffed 29.

Andrew Lorraine

Lorraine, a left-handed starting pitcher, was in Oakland's minor league system for four years before being called up on Aug. 12, two days before his 25th birthday.

He won his first two starts and posted an overall 3-1 record, but with a 6.44 ERA. He started in six games and relieved in five others, giving up 45 hits in 29 innings, two homers, 15 walks and he struck out 17.

Lorraine has visited Israel with his family. At Yad Vashem, they looked up the name of their ancestral Polish village.

"A lot of family, great aunts and uncles, didn't make it out of the concentration camps," he said.

Luckily, his grandmother did.

New Israeli jet gets Canadian-built engine

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

BEN-GURION AIRPORT — Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI), Israel's largest hi-tech concern, recently unveiled its new executive jet, the Galaxy, powered by a Canadian-built engine.

The new plane is the product of a joint venture between IAI and the Hyatt Corp., which is owned by the Pritzker family from Chicago.

IAI and Hyatt have established a new company, Galaxy Aerospace Corp., and have invested $150 million (US) in the plane's design and production.

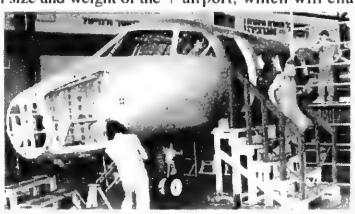
If all goes according to schedule, the Galaxy is expected to make her maiden flight this December and the first deliveries will commence in the spring of 1999.

IAI designers and engineers considered several options for the Galaxy's engines, but in the end they opted for the new PW306A turbofan jet, manufactured by Pratt and Whitney in Canada.

IAI engineers were impressed with the engine's performance and fuel efficiency. As well, the overall size and weight of the PW306A was smaller than comparative engines available, making it an ideal choice for this new state-of-the-art executive jet.



Aircraft engineers work on the fuselage of the Galaxy Executive jet. [Isranet]

"The decision to build the Galaxy was taken in 1992," said IAI's president and CEO, Moshe Keret. "Our goal has been to expand into the non-defence market so that we could change our image and deepen our interest in the commercial markets. The eventual aim is to see 40 to 50 percent of IAI production going to the commercial market."

The Galaxy is expected to enable IAI to achieve its new commercial ambitions.

The specification and price/performance ratio reported by Galaxy are very impressive. It can seat between eight and 19 passengers, depending on the configuration. It has a range of 3,620 nautical miles, which enables the plane to fly nonstop from New York to Paris in 8¼ hours. Another attractive feature is the plane's price. It will sell for $16 million, which represents incredible value for money in the large-sized executive jet sector where prices range today from $20 to $37 million.

"The plane will be marketed and maintained by Galaxy Aerospace in a new facility based at Alliance Airport at Fort Worth, Tex." said Galaxy Aerospace CEO Brian Barents. "We considered 43 locations for our new worldwide headquarters. It had to be in North America because almost 70 percent of all executive jets sold in the world today are sold to North American customers. In the end we opted for Alliance because Federal Express [is] introducing a new hub at the airport, which will enable us to fly our spare parts to anywhere in the world at very short notice."

The prospects for Galaxy sales seem very good. There are today some 2,600 mid-sized business jets in operation around the world, with an average age of 17 years. This means that many will have to be replaced in an expanding executive market.

IAI is planning to produce two aircraft a month with the possibility of increasing to three per month if there is the demand.

GOLDEN GLAZED CHICKEN

1 Spanish onion, sliced
salt and pepper to taste
4 chicken breasts with bone in
1/3 cup liquid honey
1/4 cup dijon mustard
2 tblsp. lemon juice
1 tblsp vegetable oil
1 tblsp curry powder

Spread onions in bottom of greased 13"x9" glass baking dish. Sprinkle with salt & pepper. Arrange chicken breasts on top (remove skin if you like) sprinkle with pepper.

In small bowl combine honey, mustard, lemon juice, oil and curry powder until well blended. Pour over chicken (can be prepared ahead of time and refrigerated for up to 8 hours). Bake uncovered in 375°F oven for 45 minutes or until chicken is no longer pink inside, basting 2 or 3 times during cooking. Serves 4. Enjoy!.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

Last month, I quit my job because I was upset about the way my boss' partner acted towards me. Whenever he was near, it was too near and I often felt him brush an arm or leg against my rear end. He also tended to make suggestive comments to me when he thought no one could hear. Even though I was only there three months when I quit, I felt it was my only way out of attending a conference alone with my boss' partner. My question for you is this: How will I describe this situation when I interview for a new job?

Dear Reader,

You will say you left your job because of differences between yourself and your boss' partner. You may explain that it would be a breach of company confidence to discuss the situation further. Hopefully your former employer is willing to be a reference for you and you can give his or her name and number to the interviewer if it is desired. The fact that you were sexually harassed in your previous job is nobody's business but your own and it should not affect your future employment.

Moments of the present

GENERATION TO GENERATION

Like the tides that surge and recede by dint of beckoning forces, our lives too are shaped by energies and currents that we mostly feel, but can neither see nor understand.

However, during the first 10 days of Tishrei, the days of introspection and of self-assessment, the passage of our years becomes somehow clearer to us. For religious and irreligious alike, Rosh Hashanah reminds us of time's constant melancholy tug upon the forward momentum of our lives.

Time – and the awareness of it – are ever present factors that shape human life. And how we relate to time is an ever present factor that shapes individual lives.

The late Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik wrote that consciousness of time, along with consciousness of place, were the two fundamental dimensions of kedushah, of holiness. But he pointed out there were two categories of time-consciousness: qualitative and quantitative. Only the former, qualitative time-consciousness, he emphasized, was the means to a life of higher meaning and purpose, of commitment and creativity.

Editorial

Qualitative time-consciousness, he wrote, was "the appreciation of the enormous implications inherent in the fleeting moments of the present. No fraction of time, however infinite, should slip through the fingers, left unexploited; for eternity may depend upon the brief moment."

The contrast between the timeless, innocent, endearing little boy and the timeless, ancient craggy stones of the Wall enables us to see and helps us to understand what we usually can only feel, what Rabbi Soloveitchik referred to as the "enormous implications in the fleeting moments of the present."

The page of the calendar turns to 5758 and we will pray that no longer will infinite fractions of time slip through our fingers.

Bibi speaks to The CJN

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu gave a Rosh Hashanah interview in his Jerusalem office to Edgar Asher, The CJN's Israel correspondent. The conversation covered many of the present political, social and economic issues that affect the Jewish people in Israel and in the Diaspora.

CJN: Mr Netanyahu, would you give your views concerning the crisis over the occupation of the house in Ras Al Amud, following the Sept. 18 agreement with U.S. millionaire Irving Moskowitz, which resulted in the three families leaving his east Jerusalem property.

NETANYAHU: Israelis have the right to live anywhere within the sovereign territory of Israel. But in the case of Jerusalem we tend to build neighborhoods in particular places. There will be a new neighborhood in Har Choma, thousands of houses for both Jews and Arabs. Har Choma is empty and very large. It is government policy to permit private contractors to build at Har Choma — we haven't decided to build in Ras Al Amud.

The question of the law of eviction and protection of property is clear, but the law is not so clear about national security risks and this we have to consider also. We want to defuse the tension and preserve the unity and rights of the people. It is a complicated equation, but I think it is achievable.

Chanukah Continuity Campaign

The photo on the front page of our Rosh Hashanah issue conveys in a forceful and moving way the importance of feeling part of the Jewish community. The young boy, just at the dawn of his life, reaches for and kisses the Western Wall, which represents for us all the eternality of life. The photo captures the essence of Jewish continuity.

As a way of helping to ensure the irreversibility of that continuity, The CJN is launching a special continuity subscription campaign in time for Chanukah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $14.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Over the past few years, The CJN has grown and evolved into an award-winning national community newspaper widely read both here in Canada and abroad. We are extremely proud of this publication.

Could there be a better gift at Chanukah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Sincerely,

Mordechai Ben-Dat

PA spurns U.S. request

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON – The Palestinian Authority (PA) Sunday spurned a last-minute U.S. request that it send a delegation of experts capable of bringing several major interim agreement issues to closure when the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations resumed.

The rejection is believed to be due to the PA's position that the talks should deal with issues outside the realm of interim status matters.

A Palestinian source said the PA's decision not to send any committee heads to Washington reflected its refusal to conclude deals on technical issues, such as the Dahaniya Airport, for fear they would provide Israel with political cover for its refusal to make concessions on substantive issues such as further redeployment. In taking this stand, the PA leadership was fully aware that it would provoke the American go-betweens, the source said.

Foreign Minister David Levy told reporters upon arriving here that he was "surprised" that the Palestinians are "projecting pessimism" in advance of the talks, an attitude which he said "usually doesn't go hand-in-hand with a willingness to make progress." Israeli officials have "the authorization and optimism and the serious intentions necessary to progress," Levy said.

Levy and the PA's Mahmoud Abbas are to meet with Secretary of State Madeleine Albright before proceeding to a suburban campus for the negotiations.

'Projecting pessimism'

In the absence of a complete Palestinian delegation, Saeb Erekat and Nabil Shaath have been authorized by PA Chairman Yasser Arafat to negotiate respectively on the opening of a jointly run industrial park at Karni and of a Palestinian airport at Dahaniya.

But an Israeli Embassy official called that a "disappointing" situation, because "it prevents the possibility of reaching an agreement" on those two items.

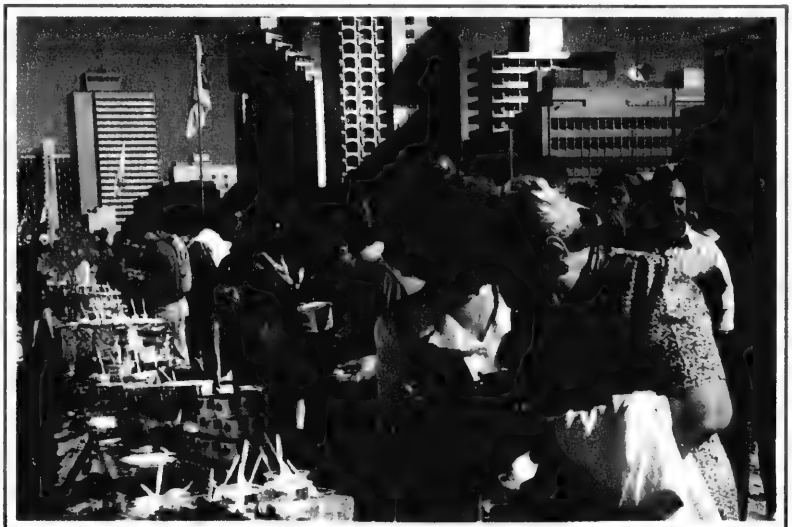
"Karni could have been concluded [here]. If there are no experts here, how can it be concluded?" he said.

Levy was scheduled to meet Sunday night with U.S. special Middle East coordinator Dennis Ross and get a better idea how the discussions would be arranged in light of the truncated Palestinian team, the embassy official said. Israel was in touch throughout the day with the U.S. team, which passed on Jerusalem's concerns to the Palestinians, he added.

Concluding negotiations on the interim phase issues was to have constituted one portion of the talks. The sides will also discuss how to move into final status negotiations, improving security cooperation, the overdue IDF redeployments, and Albright's call for an Israeli "time-out" in settlement construction.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai was also to arrive here for a three-day visit unconnected to the negotiations.

Jay Bushinsky contributed to this report.



BREAKFAST IN ISRAEL

A mile-long table set at the beach in Tel Aviv beckoned Israelis as local chefs attempted to set a record for the world's longest breakfast. The table featured 120,000 yogurts and puddings, 20 tons of cheese, two tons of cornflakes, 3,000 loaves of bread and 20,000 jam jars. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Family, faith, identity

By DAVID HARTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

The modern world has witnessed the breakdown of a shared understanding among Jews of how they are meant to live. In contrast to many periods in the past, Torah and Halachah no longer define the collective or individual convictions of the majority of the Jewish people. The interaction with modern civilization and culture has weakened the controlling influence of classical Judaism over contemporary Jewry. While we may lament this loss and fear for the spiritual and cultural future of Jewish history, we must recognize this dramatic change in Jewish consciousness as a fact of modernity.

Commentary

This erosion of normative consensus was accompanied by the evolution of family into the basic concept informing Jewish self-understanding and commitment. Sociologically speaking, family rather than norm defines the fundamental experience of Jewish unity and accountability.

Family-related notions of "people," "memory," "shared suffering," and "history" have emerged as the primary cementing values uniting Jews

The News in Brief

CANADA

Hadassah Bazaar

VANCOUVER — The Hadassah Bazaar took place this week at the Forum building at the Pacific National Exhibition.

According to Sheryl Morris, the publicity director for the 46th annual bazaar, "the theme of this year's bazaar was Something for Everybody." And to this end, Morris notes, a concerted effort was made this year to cater to a broad range of people.

Aside from raising money for a worthwhile cause, Morris feels that the bazaar "pulls the community together."

Commemorative Book

TORONTO — To celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary, Toronto's Jewish community is producing a commemorative book, Toronto Remembers. This photo-history book will highlight Torontonians' connections with Israel, through personal stories and photos. The book will also profile organizations and individuals who helped build the State of Israel. The deadline for submissions is Nov. 10. For more information, call 416-635-2883, ext. 705.

BB Opens New Office

OTTAWA — B'nai Brith Canada recently opened its new office here at 112 Kent St. It will be staffed by Rubin Friedman as the director of government relations.

Canadian Jewish Press

OTTAWA — To mark the centenary of the Jewish press in Canada, the National Library of Canada is hosting a lecture on Nov. 12 at 7:30 p.m.

CJC Meets With Robillard

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress representatives met recently with Citizenship and Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard to discuss issues of concern to the Jewish community.

Names Sought

MONTREAL — The State Museum of Auschwitz-Birkenau is compiling a list of persons who were deported to this former Nazi concentration camp with their family and friends.

The purpose is to enable the museum to honor both survivors and the memories of those who perished. Individuals are asked to enclose their own address and to mark the envelope as archive material.

Information should be mailed or faxed to Henrik Swiebocki, State Museum Auschwitz-Birkenau, 32-603 Oswiecim, Wiezniow Oswiecima 20, Poland, fax: 011-4833431934.

Harmony Award

TORONTO — Ruth Goldbloom was honored at the Harmony Movement's second annual Harmony Award Banquet. The award is given in recognition of "an individual or organization that has made significant contributions towards eliminating the social barriers to mutual understanding and trust."

Barrie Lawyer Honored

BARRIE, Ont. — Barrie lawyer Sam Delmar was recently presented with the first Simcoe County Law Association's Lawyer of the Year Award.

The 36-year-old lawyer was diagnosed with cancer over two years ago and despite his illness, he continued practising until recently.

ISRAEL

Pollard Petition

JERUSALEM — The Israeli High Court of Justice is considering a petition calling on the Israeli government to recognize that Jonathan Pollard was an agent for Israel.

The petition also asked the court to order the government to release classified documents which claim to prove that Pollard's activities were overseen by senior Israeli authorities.

WORLD

Religious Freedom

MOSCOW — Human rights activists have established an organization to protect the freedom of religion in Russia.

The new group was formed as a direct response to a law passed last month restricting the rights of religions that have not officially operated in Russia for at least 15 years.

Property Claims

MOSCOW — Officials in the western Ukrainian city of Lvov are refusing to return a building that previously belonged to the Jewish community.

Russian Nukes

MOSCOW — On the heels of reports that Russia is helping Iran develop missile technology, Moscow appears to be ready to increase its dealings with Libya.

The Russian minister for emergency situations has announced that Russia is ready to start talks with Libya on overhauling one of its nuclear research centres.

Claims Conference

NEW YORK — The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany has appointed Ze'ev Sher, a noted Israeli attorney and government official to head the Independent Review Office of the Article 2 Fund, which provides pensions to needy Jewish survivors of Nazi persecution. For further information, call 212-696-4944.

Warsaw Jews Organize Communal Body

ROME — Warsaw's Jews have formally established an organized Jewish religious community, electing a board that for the first time in Poland includes women.

Five out of seven of the new board members were born after World War II, marking a significant change in the local Jewish leadership profile.

Prior to its creation this month, there was no official Jewish community operating in Warsaw.

Warsaw Jews instead came under the Warsaw-based Federation of Jewish Religious Communities in Poland, the umbrella organization of the country's Jewish groups.

The new Warsaw community plans to broaden its scope of activities so that local operations will no longer be identified only with synagogue service and charity.

This, founding members say, is aimed at attracting membership, particularly among young people.

Reform, Conservative Jews use pause to give Israel time

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Reform and Conservative Zionists in Canada will use the three-month reprieve granted in the battle over Israel's conversion bill to cool off and regroup, after weeks of a pressure campaign that included letter-writing and meetings with the Israeli ambassador.

Both groups say they will keep low profiles for the next three months to allow the commission headed by Israel's Finance Minister, Ya'acov Ne'eman, to find a compromise with Israel's Orthodox establishment.

Last week in Jerusalem, leaders of Arza, the North American Reform movement's Zionist arm, met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to express their alarm at the legislation. Included in the delegation was Harvey Zimmerman of Toronto, the immediate past president of Arza Canada, the Canadian Association of Reform Zionists.

Zimmerman told The CJN that the purpose of the 90-minute meeting was "not to tell Israel what to do or how to vote, but to tell them of the consequences for Diaspora Jewry should these bills pass. They would create a great rift between Israeli Jews and Diaspora Jews.

"Our argument is not with the Orthodox. Our concern is the consequences," he said.

A delegation from Arza Canada met early last week in Ottawa with David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada, to express this country's large Reform community's "firm opposition" to the conversion bill, and to another bill that would ban Reform and Conservative Jews from sitting on regional religious councils.

The statement to Sultan said Canadian Reform Jews consider legislation preventing the non-Orthodox from "articulating [their] religious needs... a willful attempt at destroying the very foundation on which the Jewish state was built."

The next day in Israel, the Conservative and Reform movements, at the urging of Israeli President Ezer Weizman, gave Netanyahu a three-month reprieve in the dispute over the bills.

Leaders of the two movements had said they would press on with their court challenge to the bills, but reversed themselves to allow the Ne'eman committee to find a compromise.

The committee has until Jan. 31, 1998 to hammer out a deal that would accommodate the non-Orthodox.

In the interim, "we won't be doing anything of a public nature," said Mark Anshan, president of Arza Canada. "We'll take a back seat."

Anshan spoke to The CJN from Dallas, where he was attending the biennial meeting of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the North American Reform movement's umbrella.

He said movement president Eric Yoffe implied in a speech that Reform Jews the world over will not stand for any more extensions of the committee's work.

The Ne'eman committee missed an Aug. 15 deadline and has yet to offer any proposals.

The conversion bill, which seeks to invalidate all non-Orthodox conversions, last spring passed the first of three readings in the Knesset by

We owe a great debt to those who fought bravely

From the editor's desk

Like most of my generation, I was born into a world in which Hitler had been vanquished and the State of Israel had arisen just a handful of years earlier.

I understood the world in the innocent and simplistic way of most youngsters, as if history was a documentary and time a projector reeling out yesterday's events in the reliable testament of black and white celluloid.

It would take many years before I understood that I was not even at the beginning of understanding what those words actually meant.

The Nazis were the flesh and bones of pure evil. And they were defeated by the Allied forces.

This was the anchor that lent stability and certainty to my moral compass, namely, that our soldiers helped to defeat the Nazis.

But even the term "soldiers," was more abstract than real. To a youngster, child of immigrants after World War II, soldiers were the men and women of the American army who fought bravely, in black and white, on the movie screen and though they were shot, seemed never to bleed. They were men like John Wayne and Gregory Peck.

But as I grew older and began to understand that I did not understand, it became clear that Hollywood was not war and that actors were not soldiers.

Soldiers were the "ordinary" men and "ordinary" women of "ordinary" life. We see them when strolling near a park or when buying our groceries in the market. That they lived when so many of their friends and comrades did not, was as often due to chance as to bravery.

We who have never gone off to war – now more than three generations born since World War II – will never understand the truth of their experiences.

Remembrance Day, once a more honored occasion in our schools and in our streets, is next week. It is important that we recognize our soldiers and that we remember who they were.

The honor guard that appears in the accompanying photo is intended to help us to do that. In their youth, they were our soldiers. Today, they are our parents and our grandparents and our role models.

We owe them all a great debt.

Youth

Youth from poor Jewish neighborhoods where you carried your lofty dreams like flags unfurled, with joy and song.
You grew up in storm, feverishly striving towards a sunny morn, yet never to touch it.

I see you - a forest full grown with curly heads proudly raised like crowns of rustling trees, eyes glowing with springtime dreams,
hands muscular, youthful and brave, hearts trusting, full of glad tidings.

Your spirits still hover there, in gutted towns, in ravaged lanes;
the cobblestone pavements yet wonder:
Where are those rebels and dreamers?

BJC prepares to welcome CHAT to its site

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time in three years, the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) has made a profit – $60,000, its annual meeting was told Oct. 30.

At the same time, BJC president Michael Kerbel reported that the centre's rescue from millions of dollars of debt is now "complete."

Other top officers said a new building for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) at the BJC location will bring new life to the BJC.

Construction of CHAT to house 1,000 students will begin shortly, Kerbel said.

"This joint project of CHAT will turn the BJC into a real community campus," said Joey Steiner, UJA Federation president.

The new CHAT is a joint project of the Federation, the Jewish Board of Education and the BJC, he said.

Speaking of the difficult period the former Jewish Community Centre went through when it was threatened with bankruptcy, Steiner said: "It was with great trepidation that we embarked on rescue. But it was the right thing to do. The BJC is doing an absolutely vital job We're very enthusiastic about CHAT coming here."

(The UJA Federation guided the JCC to a solution of its financial problems. Today the BJC has a bank credit line of $2.5 million and another $2.5 million has been guaranteed by the United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto.)

The profit of $60,000 this year compares to a loss of $208,000 the year before, treasurer Bruce Leboff reported.

Gift donations and rental income were both up significantly , he said, and membership retention as of September this year is ahead of last year.

Reporting a 50 percent increase in donations, Kerbel said the BJC has made "dramatic progress" and has completed a strategic plan to take it into the next millennium. The BJC will expand its community outreach and "cutting edge" programs.

Membership retention stands at 87 percent, said executive director Deborah Pinsky. The BJC was able to raise $280,000 in donations and the opening in 1998 of the hands-on My Jewish Discovery Museum at the BJC will bring new families and children into its orbit.

"Our staff is doing more with less," she said, promising that the outdoor running track will be renovated in the spring.

On health issues, the BJC is co-operating with Mt. Sinai Hospital to sponsor programs on child and adult nutrition, cardiac care and general health lectures.

A total of 800 children attended summer camp it was reported.

Describing volunteers as an endangered species, Dorothy Shoichet of the Koffler Centre of the Arts, presented volunteer awards to Jean Rodak and Jessica Thompson. A special achievement award was presented to Dr. Irv Gottesman by BJC board member Howard Stevens.

Passengers, crew recall voyage of the Exodus

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ten local survivors of the Exodus helped launch Holocaust Education Week with tales of the heroic little steamer that helped launch a nation.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

The Leah Posluns Theatre was packed to capacity last Thursday night to hear first-hand accounts of the historic vessel that tried to carry over 4,500 Holocaust survivors to the shores of Palestine.

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the voyage, immortalized in the Leon Uris book and a Hollywood treatment starring Paul Newman. Both were described last week as having taken a great deal of license with the truth.

Of the 64 ships that tried to smash the British blockade of Palestine from 1945 to '48 in the clandestine operation known as Aliyah Bet, none became better known than the Exodus.

While its passengers were turned back by the British following a fierce battle near Haifa harbor, the plight of the survivors galvanized world opinion against London and hastened the creation of Israel in 1948, the audience was told.

"What did the Exodus accomplish?" asked Nat Nadler of New York, one of the ship's crew members. "It created the State of Israel. It would have happened sooner or later, but this hurried it along."

Following a screening of a documentary on the Exodus, which aired recently on PBS, Nadler recalled that two babies were born during the voyage, despite the fact that pregnant women were not allowed aboard. He recalled meeting one of those babies 40 years later.

Meir Schwartz, a retired professor from Israel and former Haganah commander who accompanied the passengers on their voyage, recalled the heat, crowds and "dreadful" sanitary conditions aboard. But as the vessel pulled away from a French port en route to Palestine, "someone started to sing Hatikvah. This was Jewish hope, and we all got the feeling we would make it."

The Exodus was actually named the President Warfield, a luxury steamer built to carry 400. For years, it ferried people from Baltimore to Norfolk, in Chesapeake Bay.

British troops place Exodus passengers aboard trucks in Germany. [Photo from The Jews' Secret Fleet by Joseph Hochstein and Murray Greenfield.]

By 1947, it was a rustbucket, but was refitted and drafted into the secret operation that tried to bypass the British blockade of Jewish immigration to Palestine.

The Warfield took on its 4,515 passengers in the French port of Sete. After a series of cloak-and-dagger manoeuvres, it was attacked by the British in a pitched, four-hour battle just 40 kilometres from Haifa. Passengers hurled tinned food at the sailors and put up a brave fight.

"We were no pushover," said Nadler, then an idealistic 23-year-old volunteer. Nevertheless, two Jews died and over 100 were hurt in the battle.

Just before the fight, the ship's name was changed. A handwritten banner proclaimed her as Haganah Ship – Exodus 1947.

The British prevailed and the passengers were returned to France. When they refused to disembark, the British returned them to Germany – to the horror of the world.

It was then the public relations campaign turned in favor of the Jews. The world was outraged that Holocaust survivors were again interned in the land that spawned Hitler, and the British handed the matter of Palestine to the United Nations, which voted to partition the land between Arabs and Jews. That decision in turn led to statehood in 1948.

All that was a far cry from the movie, Nadler noted.

"There was no Paul Newman or [co-star] Eva Marie Saint. If there was, believe me, I would have tried to find her," he quipped.

Asked what motivated such young people to heroism and bravery, former Exodus passenger Hana Zimnowitz, now a 75-year-old widow in Thornhill, explained, "We wanted freedom, and nothing would stop us."

Abuse of women comes in many forms: panel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Too many Jewish women refuse to speak out about being abused because they don't want to bring shame to their family, says the supervisor of the women abuse program at Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS).

"They are embarrassed and humiliated, and they feel that by talking about it they will stain their children and family," said Gail Gould at a recent panel sponsored by National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section.

Also on the panel were Susan Brotman, coordinator of JF&CS' children witnessing woman abuse program, and two survivors of abuse, Shayna and Shawna.

Gould said she hesitates using the term violence when discussing woman abuse because it eliminates psychological and emotional abuse. "Woman abuse is the physical, sexual, verbal and financial abuse of women," she said.

She told the all-female audience about a woman who had endured emotional abuse from her husband for 50 years. The woman was desperately unhappy, she said, but because she had never been physically assaulted, she did not know she was in an abusive relationship.

Shayna, who spoke publicly for the first time about her marriage, said that before she got married, she was a self-confident woman who taught and did public speaking.

"Emotional abuse can obliterate one's entire sense of self. I was an intellectual, educated and articulate woman but I felt beaten. I searched for wounds [on my body], but they were not visible. Emotional abuse is the most devastating form of abuse. It scars for life."

The abuse comes in many forms, she said, but ultimately it feels the same. "A woman feels lazy, ugly, stupid. She is isolated from family and friends, blamed for everything that goes wrong and is treated with no respect.

"Young children [in these homes] learn to blame others for everything. They learn how to be abusive."

Shayna, who was raised in a small Jewish community, was taught that the Jewish family was "central to the universe. I was too embarrassed to say that something was wrong with my marriage. I didn't want to be seen as a failure."

She considered turning away from Judaism, she said, when her husband, who had become observant, made Shabbat an exhausting ordeal. "Finally, a rabbi convinced me that that was not right. That was not Judaism."

Shawna, a survivor of abuse that began when she was dating her future husband, said she decided to speak in public because she wanted to put a face on abused women. "I always thought abused women were on welfare. I never thought it was me."

She said that although the verbal and physical abuse began long before her wedding, things got even worse after the marriage. "He pushed me down the stairs when I was nine months pregnant and then talked me into staying."

Now, alone with her children, she lives in a "different kind of hell, but it is a hell I can control. I've gained back my self-esteem and I care about myself again. If I had known what leaving [my marriage] would be like, I wouldn't have left. Having left, however, I'll never go back."

Brotman advised young women and their mothers of the warning signs for potential controlling relationships. "Does he decide where you go or what you do on most dates? Does he reject the ideas you offer? Does he put down your family or friends? Is he possessive or jealous? Does he take responsibility for his own actions? For example, when he fails a test, does he blame the teacher? Does he have unexplained mood swings?"

Date rape, which includes unwanted touching or sexual activity, she said, occurs most often by people the young woman knows. "Physical abuse is rarely a one-time occurrence, it usually escalates over time."

Emotional abuse, said Brotman, is especially confusing for teens, "because it is behavior cloaked by love. It is abuse however, if one person feels fear or intimidation. In a non-abusive relationship, both partners can show anger without fear. Love includes caring, trust, honesty, closeness and respect – not jealousy, violence, pain, cruelty or the expectation that all needs should be met in one place."

Last week in the Vatican, some 60 scholars met at the invitation of the Roman Catholic Church to explore, among other things, the sources of anti-Jewish teachings within church doctrine. The Pope addressed the august assembly on the subject of anti-Jewish currents in Christian theology. According to the Globe and Mail, he told the gathering "wrong or unfair interpretations of the New Testament had created 'hostility' to the Jews in the Christian world."

To the great disappointment of Jewish lay and religious leaders, and also, one would hope, of many non-Jewish lay and religious leaders, the Pope did not acknowledge, let alone admit, either church silence or church complicity in the Nazis' destruction of European Jewry. The most he could bring himself to say was that the erroneous or unfair interpretations of the New Testament "helped in deadening consciences, so that when the wave of persecutions inspired by a pagan anti-Semitism flooded Europe...the spiritual resistance was weak."

After expressing regret that the Pope did not deliver himself of a more explicit mea culpa in relation to the Church's role during the Holocaust, Rabbi Marvin Hier, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles, described the statement as a "breath of fresh air."

We do not have the benefit of the text of the Pope's remarks before us, but if the media reports of his presentation are accurate, the pontiff's statement was much less than a breath. It was nothing more than a mere whiff.

The intersection of Church history with Jewish history, for the most part, has been a bloody vector of torture, persecution and maltreatment. The Pope knows this. Therefore, while we appreciate the direction of his remarks, we rue their short distance.

"Humanity had a right to expect more defiance from the disciples of Christ," he was reported as saying in the Globe and Mail.

Humanity?

What about the Jews?

It was the Jews – so many of whom were consumed over the ages in the flames of Church-lit or Church-inspired fires – who had a right to expect more defiance from the disciples of Christ!

It was the Jews whose pitiful cries for a million of their children failed to move the "deadened consciences" of church leaders.

It was the Jews who, begging for refuge at any door of any church, were, for the most part, turned away by the "spiritually weakened" disciples of Christ.

This pontifical omission speaks volumes. It fills in eloquently what was left unsaid by the Pope to that colloquium of scholars.

What was left unsaid was: "To the Jews, we have sinned against you and against God. Please forgive us."

No one will be fooled

Protests and violence rocked the West Bank again last weekend. The images were, by now, quite familiar. A frenzy of masked men burned the Israeli flag in front of a video camera and shouted their invective and their hatred into the microphones for the benefit of the evening newscasts, many thousands of kilometres away in North America. There would be no peace, the protesters howled, without the release of Palestinians being held in Israeli jails.

They were trying to persuade viewers at the other end of the camera that peace was contingent on granting freedom from Israeli captivity to these criminals. But no one watching in the living rooms of the west, and certainly not in Israel, will be fooled. It was because they committed acts intended to prevent and to destroy peace that these criminals wound up in Israeli jails in the first place.

Accept Gedenkdienst with open mind

*The following letter is in response to an article by David Lazarus (*CJN, Oct. 22, Montreal edition only) dealing with a dispute at the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) over a project known as Gedenkdienst. It involves having an Austrian student work at the MHMC in lieu of military service in the Austrian army.

In Claude Lanzmann's film Shoah, a Polish farmer was asked if he knew why the Germans were killing the Jews! "It is because they killed our Lord! They must be punished!" was his reply. Not until his 1956 encyclical, Nostra Aetate, did the Pope absolve the Jews of any responsibility for the Crucifixion and suffering of Christ. Thus was the Vatican distanced from the medieval dogma of "guilt by association."

I understand only too well the feelings of some of our fellow survivors, Elie Wiesel has expressed it perfectly: "For the camp survivor, life is a battle not only for the dead, but also against them. Locked up in the grip of the dead, he fears that by freeing himself he is abandoning them. Hence, the near-impossibility of loving, or of believing in humanity."

Yet Simon Wiesenthal has overcome this trauma and rightfully tells us that guilt is not collective, but belongs exclusively to the perpetrator, not to his descendants nor his compatriots.

An organization such as ours that teaches respect and tolerance for others, would do well to have as our credo, innocent until proven guilty.

Any gesture of good will extended to us, be it the renovation of a synagogue or of a cemetery, a formal or informal apology, amendments attempted or made, or even the services of a Gedenkdienst must be accepted by us with grace and an open mind.

Israel has right to say who is a Jew

I am deeply offended by the full-page ad by the New Israel Fund (CJN, Oct. 15). It is misleading, divisive and harmful to the Jewish people. The basis of their ad is "imagine a Jew in this country being told how to practise religion. That's exactly what's happening in Israel."

If the New Israel Fund is really concerned about democracy as opposed to their preconceived anti-Orthodox notions, maybe they should be pressuring the Conservative and Reform movements to consult with all their constituents, the Jews of Israel, the Israeli government and Orthodox Jewry, to have a definition and process of being a Jew that is acceptable to a clear majority of Jews. They should word the questionnaires objectively and not politically. The onus is on the Reform and the Conservative to compromise and find agreement, since they are the ones who have changed the essence of who we are after following one basic way for 3,000 years. Without Orthodox Judaism would we have survived 3,000 years and have had enough Jews to form a Jewish State?

Israel has every right to define who and how one is a Jew, since they are the Jewish state. Naturally it will exclude some members of some groups. The Israeli government should be taking the offensive and telling the Reform and Conservative movements to reverse their decisions until a consensus and agreed upon solution can be found. As long as the Reform and Conservative movements don't play around with the definition and process of being a Jew, their members' long-term Jewishness will never be in doubt. The movements are responsible for creating this crisis. They obviously were aware of the ramifications. They have to pay the consequences.

Questions Canada's actions on passport affair

Re: "Levy promises passport inquiry" (CJN, Oct. 9), I'm afraid the government of Canada will have to spend millions of dollars and millions of hours to investigate all the incidents where thousands of people in Canada have fake passports.

Maybe they should make an inquiry asking the illegal holders of passports how they procured one instead of asking the agents involved in a covert action to justify the methods they used to try to accomplish the goal of safety for their country.

Perhaps the Canadian government should be asked to explain its use of intrigue, falsification and spying when they feel it is necessary for their country and citizen's welfare.

I'm impressed with the quick response of the Canadian government to this incident. I wonder why I never hear a response to blatant violation of the laws when other countries besides Israel are involved.

Does Canada have a self-serving motivation to condemn and demand actions from Israel and respond with instant support for the Arabs? Do they ask the Arabs to show "actions that speak louder than words" when they make unfounded promises that they conveniently break and go against the rules of the Oslo peace accord?

Perspectives

Remembering Victor Frankl

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

The death of Viktor Frankl on Sept. 2, went relatively unnoticed because it occurred right in the middle of the world's preoccupation with the tragic death of Princess Diana.

I use the term "relatively unnoticed" because based on the impact that Frankl had, and continues to have, on millions of lives, his passing deserved more comprehensive coverage and tribute. What follows is my own attempt at a tribute to a man whom I am proud to have called my mentor.

Frankl's death was officially attributed to heart failure. But that could not be true, because anyone who was privileged to know this great man will testify that he had a gallant, courageous heart that never failed him.

Frankl lived 92 years. It was, by any standard, a full life, including two very happy marriages; 32 books; a distinguished career as a psychiatrist, neurologist and neurosurgeon; 28 honorary doctorates; and hobbies as diverse as mountain climbing, cartooning, musical composition, playwriting and eyeglass design!

But what ensures Frankl's place among the great luminaries of this generation is his role as teacher and inspiration. He bravely and incisively cut through the malaise of our times and offered a powerful antidote to anomy, frustration, void, depression and suicide. That antidote is meaning.

He emphasized that the search for meaning was the primary motivational force in the human being. He insisted that we are all endowed with the free will to actualize meaning, that meaning can be found in any circumstance and that we all have the capacity to find that meaning.

Frankl offered encouragement and empowerment to a generation that had gone sour on life. He argued that we are responsible for our decisions and for our lives. It was a unique fusion of philosophy and preachment. Frankl was a thinking and caring person all his life. He could never simply state his views. The caring came through in the way he fervently presented his thoughts, and in the time that he always made available for people seeking his help.

What gave him credibility was not merely the power of his insights. It was that his insights had withstood the most horrific challenge imaginable: the Nazi concentration camps. He could inspire even hardened criminals on death row, because he himself had been on death row.

Ironically, it was because he lived by the principles of meaning that he was incarcerated in the first place. Frankl had obtained a visa to come to America, but was hesitant, not wanting to leave his parents behind. When he returned home, he noticed a little piece of marble on the table. His father told him it came from the rubble of a synagogue the Nazis had burned down.

The marble was part of the fifth commandment, to "honor one's parents so that your days may be long on the land." Frankl saw this as a sign that he should stay "on the land" and honor his parents by staying with them.

I cannot prove it, but knowing Frankl, I am convinced beyond doubt that he would have stayed with his parents, marble or no marble. He was too sensitive and caring a person to have left. But he saw the marble as the clincher that left no room for doubt. It was God corroborating what he intended.

Frankl's psychology, known as logotherapy, was already in formation before the Holocaust. But it was because he endured the Holocaust that Frankl and the message of logotherapy gained worldwide attention.

After I read a few of his books in 1968, I wrote to Frankl. He called me from Vienna, without any previous connection, just a letter I had written to his publisher that was forwarded to him.

Thus began a friendship that lasted until Frankl died. Never did he beg off from reading an article I had written, because he had no time. In fact, he had no time, but he made the time.

To hear Frankl speak was a treat. Every presentation combined wisdom and passion. Frankl was on a mission: to save the Western world from itself. He insisted that life had unconditional meaning, even in the midst of suffering, and he even dared to open up the possibility of a world beyond this world wherein the meaning of this world will become apparent.

After Elizabeth Kubler-Ross (who calls Frankl her hero) and Raymond Moody, the idea of afterlife has greater currency in the "rational" world. But all this came long after Frankl boldly suggested it.

His emphasis on meaning has influenced millions. Indeed, his book, Man's Search for Meaning, which has sold 10 million copies, was voted one of the 10 most influential books in America.

My work on Frankl's philosophy concentrated on how his logotherapy (healing through meaning) relates to Judaism. Frankl always took great interest in this and was kind enough to write the forward to my book on this topic.

Frankl once said about himself that he had perhaps only one good quality: "I do not forget any good deed done to me, and I carry no grudge for a bad one."

I cannot think of anything bad that Frankl has done to me or to anyone else. But I can think of many good deeds and many inspirational ideas that he has shared with me, and with all of us. These, we should not forget. And we should remember them by applying them to our lives. We will be the better for it.

Recognize meaning in our lives

By MARNIN J. HEISEL

Viktor Emil Frankl, founder of logotherapy, "the third Viennese school of psychotherapy," died of heart failure on Sept. 2, in Vienna. Frankl, an Austrian Jewish neurologist and psychiatrist, was intimately associated with the two earlier schools of Viennese psychotherapy: Sigmund Freud's psychoanalysis and Alfred Adler's individual psychology.

Logotherapy, literally "meaning therapy," is concerned with helping individuals discover meaning in life. Indeed, Frankl's best-known work is entitled Man's Search for Meaning. In it, Frankl described his survival of Auschwitz, and provided an overview of the main premises of logotherapy. Specifically, he wrote that the best way to prevent hopelessness, depression and suicide is to recognize meaning in life.

Frankl indicated that inherent in life are objective meanings in the here and now; that human conscience guides our choice of action; and that life challenges us to fulfil these potentials for meaning. Such a position is in stark contrast to nihilistic schools of existentialism, whose adherents considered life meaningless. Frankl contended that even situations of terrible suffering hold meaning, albeit perhaps on a dimension incomprehensible to the limited human intellect.

Victor Frankl

During the Holocaust, Frankl was incarcerated in four concentration camps: Theresienstadt, Auschwitz, Kaufering and Turkheim. At the time, he noted that individuals who maintained a firm commitment to continue living could be distinguished from those who submitted to despair and suicide, by the presence of meaning in their lives. Such meaning might include the hope of re-encountering surviving family members, the potential to carry out a task, or the promise of artistic creation.

Notably, Frankl attributed his own survival to his hope of once again finding his pregnant wife and his aged parents alive, and to the task of rewriting a manuscript on logotherapy that had been confiscated by the Nazis, later to be published as The Doctor and the Soul. Tragically, neither Frankl's first wife, Tilly, nor his parents survived the camps.

Central to Frankl's philosophy is the recognition that alongside biology and psychology, human beings are invested with spirituality. Accordingly, Frankl believed that every human being is both unique and valuable. The unique capacities of the human spirit include the capacity for defiance in the face of adversity, the quality of self-transcendence and the capacity to adopt an objective perspective on one's own situation.

At root, Frankl asserted that such capacities denote the freedom of will with which comes a responsibility for our fellow human beings, for our actions, and to life itself.

Frankl wrote that history stands as a storage house filled with monuments to one's life's deeds. History will remember him with countless monuments to his courage, wisdom, generosity, and caring. He will be remembered as one of the greatest humanitarians of his time.

He is survived by his second wife Eleonore, a daughter Gabriele, son-in-law Franz Vesely, and two grandchildren, Katharina and Alexander.

Marnin Heisel is a PhD candidate in clinical psychology at York University and holds a certificate in logotherapy from the Continuing Education Division of the University of St. Michael's College in Toronto.

A surprise from Germany

It is now almost three months since my return from Germany, where I taught, also for three months, and since this may be my last column about it, I had better end with something good. Indeed, this is as good as it is unexpected.

By Emil Fackenheim in Jerusalem

For years I have felt that where the catastrophe happened is where the mending must be deepest. (I say "mending," not "healing," for scars of the Holocaust will always remain.) In this I wasn't alone either. The Christian theologian Franklin Littell has said that Germany needs a new Reformation. But I have long given this one up as wishful thinking, and so, probably, has Littell.

The Reformation has not happened, but a book of nearly 600 pages has appeared, in German, written by Christoph Muenz, a German in his 30s. To my knowledge, the book has not its like in all the English Holocaust literature. Its title is Der Welt ein Gedaechtnis Geben. (Guetersloh: Chr. Kaiser 1995) Several German theologians struggle with "giving memory" to theology – of Jewish existence before and after the Holocaust – but none has done so herculean a job of giving it. This book is a landmark.

The subtitle makes one almost feel it could only be written in German: "Geschichtstheologisches Denken im Judentum nach Auschwitz." I can translate the second part as "Thought in Judaism after Auschwitz," but what on earth is geschichtstheologisch? Geschichte is "history" and theologisch is "theological," but in English we do not bring the two together even verbally. But, argues Muenz, Judaism can be thought of rightly only if understood as geschichtstheologisch, and that has rarely been done by non-Jews, and often not even by Jews themselves.

Muenz' thesis, as complex as it is profound, can be simplified by a chassidic story he himself retells. An ignorant tailor knocks at the door of the celebrated Rabbi Levi Yitzhak of Berdichev, the morning after Yom Kippur. The rabbi wonders why he isn't at breakfast, but the tailor's story cannot wait. On Yom Kippur he related his sins to God but, not knowing enough Hebrew, he made up his own prayers, confessing dishonesty, lies, not keeping kosher strictly enough. But then – at this point he trembled as his confession went on – he cited God's sins: letting babies die, allowing wars, sickness, death; and he proposed a bargain – he would forgive God's sins if God forgave his own.

On hearing this, Rabbi Yitzhak got furious: "All you wanted was forgiveness for your own sins. But while you had God where you wanted Him you should have asked for the redemption of the world."

What do theologians do with this story? On Yom Kippur, even the most pious have "no merit" before God, for He is universal; but then they are parochial in claiming a special relation! But if an ignorant tailor can force his God, that God is as parochial as his human worshippers! The theologians, Christian but sometimes also Jewish, never get further, and forget that the God of both the pious and the ignorant Jew – to say nothing of Rabbi Levi Yitzhak – is to redeem the world. They do not grasp that whereas the Christian is with Heilsgeschicte – his faith, confirmed on the "Lord's Day" – the Jew lives with the memory of past history – the Exodus, Sinai – and present real history every day of his life, from great-grandparents to the youngest son just circumcised, trying, in one way or another, to retain fidelity in history's vagaries.

Seeing faith so closely bound up with Jewish history, Muenz shows, as few others and no other German have done, the crisis for Jewish faith in recent history, and the Jewish efforts to cope with it. It is a scandal that 50 years after the Holocaust, the German academy (history and theology departments) still virtually ignores the subject. But there could be no more apt, i.e. academic, exposure of it than Muenz' book.

A book won't start a new Reformation. But it is worth recalling that one book affected the original Reformation, most adversely. Because Martin Luther thought of Jews as stubborn rivals and a threat, his Of the Jews and their Lies made him hurl curses at them that embarrass Lutherans to this day. His Reformation might have taken a different course had he thought of Jews as fellow-believers who, even through the worst of history's adversities, seek to retain fidelity to a God who is also his own.

Looking for love

I admit the headline is plagiarized. I found it the other day at Tel Aviv's Cinemateque – an arty movie theater. Along with other journalists, artists, ambassadors and members of Israel's Labor party, I was invited to see Dan Katzir's gripping documentary, I went to look for love, I'll be back soon.

By Martin Himel in Herzliya

The occasion was a remembrance ceremony for Yitzhak Rabin, who was assassinated two years ago. You might ask: What does the murder of the prime minister have to do with looking for love? Dan Katzir's poignant answer: everything.

Katzir is really a shy Tel Aviv University student. Using a home video camera, he documented what many Israelis are searching for, especially after paying their dues in the army – love, a warm peaceful corner in which to develop an intimate life, an existence beyond the monotonous broken record of suicide bombings, terror and reserve duty.

Katzir finds Iris and they fall in love. But her army service, the bombings and ultimately Rabin's assassination make it difficult for the couple to develop their relationship.

Rabin may or may not have succeeded in bringing Israel closer to peace – it depends on your point of view. But he did instil in Israel's youth the hope that they could have the luxury of developing an inner life, a life where love, dreams, family, a business, profession, a hobby or a sport become dominant motifs – not the destiny of the Jewish people, the Middle East Conflict, the endless struggles that bombard Israelis hourly and daily over the air waves.

> The Labor party is troubled and frustrated

That dream died with Rabin. That hope, that search for "a life" so taken for granted by yourselves and so desperately needed in Israel, has sadly eluded this society.

With the peace process at a standstill and with a prime minister who can do little more than assure Israelis there will be more bloodshed, terror and no peace, Israelis have given up on finding "that inner love, that inner life."

That is why pessimism is everywhere. People are down. It doesn't matter if it is right-wing or left-wing Israelis, the upbeat mood of the Rabin era is dead and buried.

The Israeli left is quick to blame the right-wing Netanyahu government for the demise. The Labor party, however, is troubled and frustrated by the fact that it can't get its message through to the Israeli public.

The Cinemateque gathering was a case in point of the Labor party's built-in failure. The room was full of the "converted" – left-wing intellectuals, journalists, ambassadors from "pro Oslo peace process" countries. Not invited were right-wing politicians, religious leaders, Jewish settlement representatives, Jerusalem merchants, workers, in short the "unconvinced."

There is a clique characteristic among the Israeli left, a sort of intellectual snobbery. Leaders like Yossi Sarid use a sharp tongue, vivid language and tough arguments to make a point, but the left always talks down to the Israeli right, as if "they know better," as if the Israeli right is too stupid to understand.

It's no surprise they get kicked in the teeth during elections. The chain smoking "Prime Minister Rabin" was much more of a "people person." Shimon Peres was the intellectual snob who got voted out. The new Labor leader Ehud Barak is trying to be a "people person" by shaking hands with prominent rabbis and meeting with some of the "unconvinced." It is obvious that he is "trying," but there is a sort of insincerity. As long as right-wing Israelis feel "conned" by snobby left-wing leaders, the chances are Labor will remain the "loyal opposition."

Friends in far away places

An article entitled "New Zealand's Zion," appeared in the Jerusalem Report of Sept. 18. Written by David Cohen of Wellington, it revived long-buried memories of people far away.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Maoris are a Polynesian tribal conglomerate that has preserved its own tradition with great tenacity and pride. They number about half a million in a nation of nearly four million, and one of their traditional teachings is that they have a close relationship to Jews. As in many other parts of the world, there is a belief that their real ancestors belong to one of the 10 lost tribes of Israel. While in many instances this is sheer imagination, in the case of the Maoris it seems that similarities of belief and practice give that tradition at least some credence.

Before going any further, let me make it clear that the Maoris do not practise Judaism as we know it. But there are enough similar rituals to create a strong bond between them and the Jewish people.

It was a privilege for my wife and me some years ago when we visited New Zealand that we came into personal contact with Maoris. At the time, I was active in the human rights field and had occasion to meet the chair of the New Zealand commission that observes and oversees human rights practices in the nation.

It so happened that a prominent funeral took place in the Maori community and we were invited to be present. I understood that to have such an invitation extended to strangers was rare indeed. What struck us then was that the visitation was in fact very much like a shivah. The resemblance was so great that we discussed its nature with our friend and we were told that amongst the Maoris, the idea of a Jewish connection has always been and continues to be very strong.

Cohen's article goes into detail about the many resemblances between the two groups and the attitudes of the Maoris, such as their strong endorsement of their friendship with Israel. They feel that they have a veritable stake in its welfare and future.

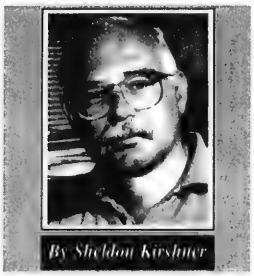
Like Jews in Israel, the Maoris have revived their ancient language, which was nearly lost, and have made it their major vehicle for communication. One of their prominent members, Steve Daniels, 34, once studied briefly to become a priest, but now describes himself as "someone who left to be in the Jewish closet, so to speak. On a deep level, as this was particularly true for me as a Maori growing up in an all-white suburb in Auckland, I felt an empathy with things Jewish... When I was a kid, I asked my mother where I came from. I honestly had no idea what it meant to be a New Zealander. For me, then, coming to Judaism was like coming home."

He did in fact convert – but even without such an act of "homecoming," the Maoris are a cultural and social ally of our people. They have a sense of isolation and purpose, and the strongest memory of my visit remains this: they feel very much as we Diaspora Jews feel. We both struggle to maintain our identity, and our sense of peoplehood is closely linked to our sense of religious destiny.

The Kirshner File

The legacy of Yitzhak Rabin

Yitzhak Rabin was gunned down two years ago this week, the only Israeli prime minister to have been assassinated.



By Sheldon Kirshner

The shock waves of that unprecedented event have yet to subside. In the meantime, readers can reflect on the murder – and Rabin's career – by delving into two intriguing books.

The first, by his widow Leah, is entitled Rabin, Our Life, His Legacy (G.P. Putnam's Sons). The second, by Rabin himself, is called The Rabin Memoirs (University of California Press). It was originally published in 1979 and has long been out of print. The new, expanded softcover edition contains a thoughtful afterword by Israeli commentator Yoram Peri, as well as fresh photographs and several of Rabin's speeches, including his last fateful one in Tel Aviv on Nov. 4, 1995.

Apart from observations on his assassination and biographical data on herself, Leah Rabin's memoir often intersects with that of her husband's. She deals, for example, with the Six Day War, his tenure as ambassador to Washington and the scandal that abruptly ended his first term as premier. Beyond these benchmarks, she covers the intifadah, during which he was defence minister, and the Oslo peace process, when he was well into his first year as prime minister again.

Even a cursory reading of Rabin, Our Life, His Legacy reveals their special relationship. On page 1, she writes: "It is very difficult to get up each morning – without you." On page 288, she muses: "You are missed at every moment."

Leah Rabin not only loved this emotionally remote man, but admired his intellectual gifts, his great discipline, his vast experience, his enormous capacity for knowledge and his organizational skills.

She discloses that he died only two minutes after he was shot by right-wing fanatic Yigal Amir; decries the deafening silence that greeted the mounting incitement against him and his policies; reveals that his predecessor, Yitzhak Shamir, never sent a word of condolence after his death; and condemns the "core of extremist rabbis" who inspired the hateful attitudes which influenced Amir and his ilk.

Her reminiscences of her childhood are interesting. She was born in Konigsburg, Germany. Her father, Fima Schlossberg, was a prosperous merchant who left the country a day after Hitler acceded to power. Shortly afterward, he brought his family to Palestine, and they basically lived off the property he had purchased there in the 1920s.

Rabin, six years her senior, caught her eye at an ice cream parlor in Tel Aviv in 1943. They met again, fell for each other and were married during the War of Independence. In the late 1950s, when Rabin was a rising star in the army, she was an English teacher. The work was unfulfilling and she quit after two years. She devoted herself to her family, never pursuing a career and never having any regrets about it.

Turning to the tense period preceding the Six Day War, when Rabin was chief of staff, she claims that his nervous breakdown was more accurately a case of nicotine poisoning, coupled with stress precipitated by David Ben-Gurion's harsh questioning of his military strategy.

According to her recollections, Rabin favored an advance on the Golan Heights, a move that Moshe Dayan, the defence minister, initially resisted.

After the war, Levi Eshkol, the prime minister, almost fell out of his chair when Rabin informed him that he wanted to be ambassador to the United States. Abba Eban, the foreign minister, opposed the appointment, but to no avail.

Rabin succeeded Golda Meir as prime minister in 1974. Leah Rabin credits Pinchas Sapir, the powerful finance minister, with having sealed his candidacy.

Rabin resigned following the disclosure that his wife maintained an illegal bank account in the United States. She claims it was an "oversight" on her part. Rabin, she adds, never berated her. He was a "classic gentleman."

The intifadah, she goes on to say, convinced Rabin that Israel could not govern the Palestinians and that only a political solution could defuse the problem.

Describing the 1993 talks between Israel and the PLO, she writes that he was skeptical about its chances of succeeding. And once he overcame his personal revulsion of Yasser Arafat, he grew to respect him as a strong, intelligent, though difficult, leader.

Almost two decades have elapsed since the publication of Rabin's memoirs, yet they are far from dated. In a cool, dispassionate style, Rabin sheds light on, among other topics, the War of Independence, the Six Day War and Israel's relations with the United States.

In his judgment, the leadership of the Yishuv was ill-prepared for the 1948 war, not having assembled enough sophisticated weapons or trained its combat forces sufficiently. Indeed, he is doubtful whether Israel would have prevailed without arms shipments from Czechoslovakia.

Looking back at the Six Day War, he recalls Ben-Gurion's criticism of his decision to call up the reserves. Ben-Gurion opposed a war and was of the opinion that Rabin had led the state "into a grave situation."

Sidelined on the eve of Six Day War

Ben-Gurion's backseat generalship, combined with exhaustion and one too many cigarette, sidelined Rabin for about a day on the eve of the Six Day War. He blames Ezer Weizman, the then chief of military operations, for having broken a confidence not to discuss his ailment.

The Israeli cabinet, we learn, was deadlocked with respect to launching hostilities in response to to Egypt's aggression. Furthermore, Rabin objected to Dayan's request for an army command.

By Rabin's account, Dayan dithered as he weighed the possibility of attacking the Golan. He also informs us that the capture of Kuneitra was a byproduct of a false Syrian radio report that the town had already fallen.

Rabin's interest in the ambassadorship to the United States stemmed from his belief that Israel's greatest political challenge was to strengthen ties with Washington. That he proceeded to do. But strangely enough, Rabin was unaware of an Israeli cabinet decision, taken on June 19, 1967, to cede the Sinai Peninsula and the Golan in exchange for a full peace treaty with Egypt and Syria. Neither, he ruefully writes, did he know that the cabinet reversed itself just two months later.

Rabin was doubtless instrumental in elevating Israel's strategic friendship with the United States. But there were bumps along the way.

When Rabin asked a senior U.S. official why the shipment of Phantom jets had been delayed, he was told they would not be delivered unless Israel consented to an American presence in and supervision of every Israeli arms manufacturing installation and every defence institution engaged in research and development.

He rejected the demand as a shameful intrusion into Israel's internal affairs. The Americans backed down, and Israel got its Phantoms.

Rabin's relations with Shimon Peres, his old rival and future successor, were fractious. He takes him to task for having been disloyal, and admits that he erred in appointing him defence minister.

In closing, Rabin delineates his political philosophy. His conservative inclinations are leavened by the pragmatic assertion that the risks of peace are preferable to the grim certainties of war.

Jewish Life

Where is this place?

By ELEANOR KUNIGIS MOIDEL

Guest Voices

The sky is as blue as ours. The foliage and its aroma are like ours. The rivers that flow through the country are reminiscent of ours. People picking berries in July could easily be mistaken for our farmers reaping their fruits. The sounds of birds and crickets are welcome to one's ears.

People go about their daily lives. In the cities they wait for buses. They carry plastic shopping bags. They ride bicycles and drive cars. In the countryside, farmers' haywagons are still pulled by horses. Goat's milk is still delivered in metal cans with handles. Bulls, cows, goats and sheep roam the fields. It is so pastoral and peaceful.

Cemeteries without tombstones. Cemeteries with memorial stones only. Rows and rows of mass graves easily visible in the very same forests where the victims used to picnic before the massacres.

Killing pits, eight metres deep, where the doomed — men, women and children — were slaughtered, buried, later dug up to have their remains ground.

Where is this place where the majority of a specific group of its inhabitants were annihilated with vigor by the Nazis and by the very willing and capable local citizens?

The place is Lithuania. The majority of the corpses were Jews — men, women and children. Why was I there recently? I was curious about the place my siblings were born. I wanted to see for myself the city Ukmerge (Vikomir) where my parents had had a bakery. I wanted to see the building that was the shul that my two sisters and brother had attended. I wanted to see the hoif (courtyard) where they used to live.

My husband and I were in luck. My sister's friend Lea, who has lived in Vilnius (Vilna) since the end of the war, and who is also from Vikomir (Ukmerge) accompanied us there. She showed us the buildings. The main synagogue (di groise shul) is now a sports arena with a plaque in Yiddish, Hebrew and Lithuanian stating that this was once a synagogue.

The building where the bakery had been housed is now the headquarters of the Ukmerge Archives. How excited I became! At last I would find out some information about my family. Alas, there are no records of marriages, births or deaths. They no longer exist. They have all been destroyed.

The house and the neighboring houses are run-down, dilapidated, in dire need of repair and paint as is most of Lithuania.

The Pivonija Forest, just outside Ukmerge, where thousands and thousands of Jews were murdered and buried in mass graves affected me profoundly. Had my mother not left with my three siblings in 1936 to join my father in Montreal, I would not have been standing at those graves.

When we visited Seredzius (Srednik), the village where my husband's father was born, it's as if time has stood still. Except for television antennas and farmers wearing '90s track suits, we thought we had stepped back in time. Once, this village whose population is very small, had 110 Jewish families. Today there isn't a Jew left, just a Jewish cemetery whose tombstones are no longer there. A memorial stone with Yiddish and Hebrew inscriptions marks the place. The stone foundation of the old synagogue on the main cobblestone road is still there.

Lithuania, for Jews, is no longer the vibrant, active, cultural community that it once was. The absence of Jews in most of Lithuania underscores the absence of economy, academia and progress in all fields.

Unfortunately, I fell in the state Jewish museum in Vilnius on the very first day of our visit. I suffered a broken bone in my right foot and severely injured the knee in my left leg. Although the doctor who saw me told me to stay off my feet, I had no choice but to hobble through Lithuania for four days. And maybe it was bashert (destined) that I should have had this accident. The pain that my husband and I suffered when confronted by mass graves, cemeteries, killing pits and the palpable absence of Jews in most places was somewhat diffused by the physical pain I was in.

Archeologists spend lifetimes digging for cities beneath existing ones. They dig for artifacts and remnants of pre-existing cultures. In generations to come, archeologists will be wasting their time in Lithuania. All they will find will be hundreds of thousands of bones, and fields of ashes of men, women and children whose aborted talents and stifled voices are lost forever to the entire Community of Man — in medicine, science, technology, music, art and "isms."

There were many groups of Jews doing the same thing while we were there. Our trip to Lithuania does not help to understand the horror of the Holocaust. It does however serve as hemshakh (continuation) for our children. We urge everyone who is able, to plan and experience their own personal March of the Living. Zakhor! (Remember)

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

We must reinclude the disenfranchised

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

"Honest, attractive, loving Aries, seeks good looking man who likes jazz, cats, foreign movies and Italian cooking. Jewish, but not important." This ad, which appeared in the personals section of a major Toronto newspaper, suggests the unbearable lightness of Jewish identity in our time. For the Jewish educator, it should be required reading.

The Torah is actually quite explicit about why intermarriage is a problem, noting that such relationships lead to "serving other gods." To which the reader may say, "I have no intention of serving other gods. In fact, I have no interest in religion whatsoever. I simply fell in love with a non-Jewish person; neither of us cares to serve any gods at all!" How then is the fundamental denunciation of intermarriage in Judaism to be discussed with such a person?

Dennis Prager and Joseph Telushkin once cautioned Jews contemplating intermarriage about what they would be losing: "The community of Israel stands ready to share with all its members its joys and sorrows. They did it for your great-grandmother and great-grandfather and for your parents in America. They will not do it for your son and daughter, because you have removed them from the Jewish community." This is a moving plea, but it is only true to the extent that people feel part of Jewish communities in the first place and believe that they have been nurtured and strengthened by them.

"Jewish, but not important" is a staggering rebuke of not just the breakdown of Jewish life that has occurred within many families, but more strikingly, of Jewish peoplehood as it currently exists. Put simply, there are many Jews for whom living within the Jewish community has been an experience in isolation, while marrying the gentile with whom they fall in love creates a sense of belonging. We in the Jewish world must recognize that many in our ranks are "lonely among us" and see no reason for staying within – indeed, they often consciously or unconsciously seek to rebel against – the confines of the synagogue or the chupah.

The very dichotomy of "love versus tradition" implies a choice between, on the one hand, a romantic relationship that promises companionship and joy and, on the other hand, an idea that often stuffily calls forth history and duty.

Though it is true that the idea of "Jewish survival" may emotionally convince a certain percentage of Jews who are on the verge of intermarrying to reconsider, they are in the minority and will remain that way. Human beings can become excited by ideas and traditions, even abstract ones, but what we really find compelling are other people, who make ideas come alive for us and help us to negotiate the many difficulties of reality.

When Jewishness takes a back seat to astrological signs, Italian cuisine and a taste for jazz, we are encountering a deep kind of alienation. With so much focus in Jewish educational circles these days on Judaism as a vehicle for realizing one's individual potential or spiritual growth, we need to re-emphasize the notion of peoplehood and our task to reinclude the disenfranchised within our midst. Otherwise we risk turning Judaism into an increasingly exclusive and aging club, as our young people sail into the sensual harbor of modernity, while the remaining faithful sing in vain of tradition, of what is past and passing and to come.

Plenty of kosher veggie recipes on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we began our look at Jewish vegetarianism and the places where you can find information on the World Wide Web. From gefilte fish to kreplach to chicken soup, meat and fish have become central to the Jewish palate. So finding vegetarian replacements that maintain links with our tradition can be a bit of a challenge.

I was interested to find that many of the kosher vegetarian recipes on the Internet are geared toward Passover (but of course, can be enjoyed year-round). You can find some meatless alternatives at Vegetarian Fatfree Passover Recipes [http://web.mit.edu/yaron/www/passover.html].

There are recipes for Broccoli Knishes, Eight Vegetable Stew and Cabbage Souffle Pudding. Also check out the Far-from-Comprehensive List of Vegetarian Pesach Recipes [http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/pschrcpt.htm]. I particularly like the recipe titled Not-Chicken Soup. You can find a large selection of Jewish vegetarian books along with some excerpts at [http://www.micahbooks.com/jewishvegbooks.html] and yet more Jewish recipes at [http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/bhfood.htm].

There are many more general vegetarian recipes out there on the Internet. Yahoo's index is found at [http://gnn.yahoo.com/Entertainment/Food_and_Eating/Recipes/Vegetarian/].

There are a couple of Usenet newsgroups geared toward vegetarians [news:rec.food.veg] and [news:rec.food.veg.cooking]. And if you have questions about keeping kosher and being a vegetarian, you can join the Jewish Vegan e-mail list [http://www.jer1.co.il/city_services/lists/vegan/].

Sometimes eating right can lead to more than just a trimmer waist and lower cholesterol. Jewish Vegan/Vegetarian Singles can be found at [http://www.goodnet.com/~tjvmab/tj14000.html].

You can still keep kosher and vegetarian even if you're on the road. The Kosher Restaurant Database [http://shamash.org/kosher/krestquery.html] has information about over 50 kosher vegetarian restaurants around the world and Jewish Vegetarians of North America maintains a Web site at [http://www.orbyss.com/jvna.html]. To find out more about Israeli vegetarian organizations and restaurants, go to [http://www.veg.org/veg/Guide/Israel/all.html] and [http://www.vrg.org/press/96augisguide.html].

If you really want to be pampered and well fed, there's the Israeli vegetarian village of Moshav Amirim [http://www.tour-israel.co.il/upGalil/upGalil002.html]. The Moshav offers a bed and breakfast fifteen minutes from the old city of Tzfat.

Oh, to sit in a private garden overlooking the sea of Galilee munching on veggies.

B'tayavon and es gezunterheit.

TORAH DEDICATED AT SUNNYBROOK'S CHAPEL

There was celebrating and dancing under the chupah during the recent presentation of a sefer Torah to the Jewish chapel at the Sunnybrook Health Science Centre. Rabbi Barry Schneider (left) and Rabbi Joseph Kelman (centre) attended the event. The Torah was donated by the family of the late Max Nudelman.

Midrashic Moments

Abraham, Sarah were equal partners in the covenant

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

This month's readings begin the ancestral journey toward cementing a convenant with God. Abraham and Sarah, originally named Abram and Sarai, are childless. We are told that Sarai is barren and thus the Divine promise of children as innumerable as the sands and the stars is particularly meaningful.

When God reiterates this promise to Abram, he turns to God and says: "What can You give me while I still remain childless?" The promise for children is once again extended. Sarai continues to be barren and she suggests to Abram that he conceive a child with her handmaid Hagar, but says she will raise the child and enter the covenant through the child.

There are modern scholars who suggest that although Abram enters the covenant through a relationship with God, Sarai is excluded and must enter through the womb of another woman. The situation is far from ideal.

Abram agrees to the arrangement and Hagar soon becomes pregnant. However, Hagar begins to demean Sarai and Sarai turns to Abram with astonishing words: "My anger is upon you! God will judge between you and me!"

Sarai invokes God as the judge between Abram and her and not between Hagar and her, which is where the controversy seems to lie.

Interestingly, no one consulted God before embarking on this parental jog to fulfil the covenant and yet god is called upon to settle the matter.

The midrash comments on many of these issues. Sarai's anger is directed at Abram and not at Hagar, and rightly so. The midrashi states that when Abram was representing his childlessness before God, he cried out only for his own emptiness and excluded his wife. Sarai is angry with Abram for saying, "What can You give me while I remain childless?" Had he said, "While we remain childless," she would not have had to resort to such extraneous means.

For one fleeting moment Abram forgot that he was part of a marriage and he negated his commitment to his wife. The midrash offers the analogy of two friends who are both in prison when the king is passing through. One friend beseeches the king to remove his humiliation and sorrow. The king agrees and the man is freed. His friend turns to him and says that he must now bear the humiliation of having left his friend in prison by not including him in his appeal to the king. The midrash chastises Abram for his exclusion of his wife…his friend.

God does stand as final judge in the matter when the covenant is ratified and God states quite clearly to Abram that the covenant can only be fulfilled through the union of Abram and Sarai – the child they will have together. This promise is cemented when God inserts a letter from the Divine Name into both Abram and Sarai's names, creating Abraham and Sarah. They are equal partners in the covenant and the founding of the Jewish nation.

To argue that Judaism presents a covenantal relationship only to Abraham is to ignore both the Bible and the midrash in their inclusion of Sarah.

Peace activist to launch Book Fair

TORONTO — The 21st annual Jewish Book Fair, Nov. 8 to 16, will showcase author/cartoonist Ben Wicks, who will launch his book Dawn of the Promised Land – The Birth of Israel on Nov. 12 at 6:30 p.m.

JEWISH BOOK FAIR

Wicks will talk about his book at a reception following the launch and will autograph copies.

This year's fair will feature 34 programs, all taking place at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St.

Opening night will feature noted Israeli author and peace activist David Grossman, best known for The Yellow Wind. His topic will be Imagining Peace.

Rabbi Yehuda Fine, who counsels runaways in New York City, will speak on Helping Young People Emerge From Hell (Nov. 11, 1:30 p.m.).

Other speakers are Globe and Mail reporter Isabel Vincent (Nov. 13, 8 p.m.) discussing the Swiss banking debacle described in her new book, Hitler's Silent Partners.

Other highlights include Helen Epstein, author the groundbreaking work Children of the Holocaust, speaking on Bringing the Past to Life: Three Generations of Remarkable Women (Nov. 9, 8 p.m.).

Prof. Elaine Newton will read from the memoirs of female Holocaust survivors (Nov. 10, 8 p.m.).

Opening night: David Grossman

Rosalie Sharp, contributing editor of Growing Up Jewish — Canadians Tell Their Own Stories, will introduce contributing writers Rosalie Abella, Morley Torgov, Ben Kayfetz, Julia Koschitzky, Fred Weinberg, Beatrice Fischer, Martin Goldfarb and Shirley Granovsky (Nov. 11, 8 p.m.).

Carol Matas, author of The Garden: In Honor of Israel's 50th Anniversary, will appear at a school program for grades 5 to 8 on Nov. 12 at 10:30 a.m. and again at 1:30 p.m.

Former Mossad agent Peter Malkin, who captured Adolf Eichmann, speaks on his book, Eichmann in My Hands on (Nov. 15, 8 p.m.).

In addition to the 12,000 books of Jewish interest for sale, bargain hunters will find a large selection of what organizers call "once-over-slightly" books.

For information, call 416-636-1880, ext. 368.

Educators to hold retreat

TORONTO — Once a year, educators in the Toronto Jewish educational system meet at a weekend retreat that provides opportunities for learning together and socializing in ways that enhance the work of the individual day and supplementary schools on one hand and the spirit of am echad (one people) on the other.

This year's retreat will take place Nov. 14 to 16, and will feature Prof. David Novak as its keynote speaker and scholar in residence.

Novak is a professor of religious studies and philosophy and the director of the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto. He has taught in universities in the United States, has lectured extensively on four continents and has written nine books and many articles.

Novak's four presentations at the Conference will focus on the topic of Ethics in Jewish Education: Practising What we Teach. The sessions will include discussions on the responsibilities of the Jewish educator and the portrayal of Jews in film, as well as case studies, group activities and workshops.

A special project will be initiated on the occasion of Toronto's 1997 Negev Dinner Tribute saluting Edward Bronfman. Proceeds from the Dinner will be used for land reclamation and project development at Kibbutz Neot Semadar, in the southern Arava region of the Negev Desert. The young pioneers of Neot Semadar require our assistance to help ensure economic stability and a bright future for them and their children in a very barren area of the wilderness known as the Arava, just north of Eilat.

In saluting Edward Bronfman, the Jewish National Fund will assist Neot Semadar in reclaiming hundreds of dunams of land for agricultural use, help develop an Artists Centre, develop roads to the Kibbutz and within the Kibbutz, and assist the construction of a fifty thousand cubic metre reservoir. A resort area to promote tourism will also be developed. This undertaking will surely be a source of great pride to all who will have participated in this very worthy project. Together, we can all help to make the desert green.

Toronto yeshivah student attacked in Moscow

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A volunteer stint in the former Soviet Union turned into a nightmare for three yeshivah students, including one from Toronto, when they were mugged in the streets of Moscow by anti-Semitic thugs.

The assault in broad daylight left one of the students with a bloody nose and a broken hand requiring surgery, while another lost two front teeth. Toronto native Dov Schochet, the third student, escaped the attack with minor injuries.

Moscow police were called to the scene almost immediately after the attack, which took place last spring, but so far, little has been done to bring the assailants to justice. Schochet has travelled to Russia three times at the behest of Russian police and is frustrated that much of his time on two of the trips was wasted while the Russian justice system spun its wheels.

Although The CJN learned of the attack early in the summer, Schochet asked that no story be written until a trial set for September was held. That trial has been put on hold.

Red Square

The initial incident took place last April, shortly after Schochet was interviewed by The CJN in Minsk, where he and two other students had travelled from the Lubavitcher yeshivah in Manchester, England to assist Belarussian Jews celebrate Passover. During their one-month stint, the students travelled to Moscow for a visit and were returning to the Tanchei Temimim Yeshivah from a tour of Red Square when the attack occurred.

Schochet said the three, wearing dark blazers and fedora hats, were walking past some youths when one said something to them in Russian. One of the yeshivah students, originally from Minsk, translated the statement as "kill the Jews and save Russia."

After a brief verbal exchange, five other Russian youths approached. One, who looked like a skinhead, opened his jacket and put down two bottles of beer, before making a beeline for them. The yeshivah students walked away and thought they had escaped when they were set upon by seven Russian youths. In the melee, Schochet suffered a chipped tooth and some bruises.

As for his companions, "their faces were totally blown up twice the size, black and blue, everything," he recalled.

After the attack, former Refusenik Izza Kogan, who was serving as a shaliach to the Moscow yeshivah, arranged for a visiting Israeli doctor to see the students. Two days later, Schochet and his friend flew to Manchester where the student was immediately operated on and a metal plate inserted in his injured hand.

Yeshivah student Boris Ostrovski after being attacked.

After he recovered, they returned to Moscow to meet with police.

Visiting the area where the attack took place, Schochet's friend recognized one of the attackers. Police picked him up and the youth identified the other assailants.

During a second trip to Moscow, Schochet and the others completed depositions and identified the attackers.

Over the summer, Schochet was told that the skinhead ringleader had also been charged with shooting his army commander and that police were hoping to merge the two cases. Schochet recently returned from yet another visit to Minsk and Moscow, during which he expected to testify. He was disappointed to learn the case was not yet ready for court

Despite the incident, Schochet has not been deterred from visiting Moscow nor did it change his opinion about the safety of Jews in the city. Attacks on Jews can happen anywhere, including England, he said. A yeshivah student in Manchester was punched in the face by a young tough for no apparent reason other than anti-Semitism, he added.

Schochet is unsure when, or even if, the Moscow case will be heard. "I'd love to see them prosecuted, especially if it brings some safety to the area," he said.

Adding insult to injury was an incident he and his friends endured at the Berlin airport when returning to Manchester from Moscow. The three were taken aside by a customs officer who "barked" at them and berated them. When Schochet asked for his name to file a complaint, the officer formed his thumb and forefinger into the figure of a gun and pointed it as his head, suggesting they'd kill him if he told them his name.

Schochet and his father, Rabbi Elisha Schochet, complained to German authorities and were later told the officer had been displaying erratic behavior and had subsequently been fired.

As for Schochet, he plans to continue his religious studies in New York.

A Message from the Board of Governors of Aish HaTorah Toronto

Aish HaTorah and the State of Israel
Official Statement of Policy

1. Aish HaTorah stands for Jewish education for all Jews everywhere. We seek unity among all Jews. Our goal is to re-ignite Jewish pride by teaching Jews about their heritage and its contribution to humanity. We were founded to combat assimilation, alienation and indifference among Jews.

2. Aish HaTorah believes that the State of Israel is a divine gift. That's why Rabbi Weinberg, a native-born American, chose to found it in Jerusalem and that's why Aish HaTorah has encouraged thousands of Jews to study in Israel and many to make aliyah.

3. The flag of Israel flies from the roof of the Aish HaTorah World Center—the Dan Family Building, every day. We recognize Israel Independence Day and Jerusalem Reunification Day. We do not take these important milestones for granted.

4. Governors of Israel, be they Labor or Likud, have recognized the contribution of Aish HaTorah to the Jewish State and the Jewish people. Indeed, the initial site facing the Western Wall where the Aish HaTorah World Center stands today was awarded to us for the symbolic sum of 1 Shekel by a Likud Government, headed by Prime Minister Menachem Begin. The site of the Aish HaTorah at the Western Wall Educational Center, now under construction, was transferred to us by the Labor Government, under the leadership of the late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

5. Aish HaTorah has been endorsed by every Israeli Prime Minister, beginning with the late Menachem Begin. Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu, like his predecessors, Shimon Peres, Yitzhak Rabin and Yitzhak Shamir, has participated in Aish HaTorah's education programs. President Ezer Weizman and the late Chaim Herzog addressed our students and our supporters on many occasions.

6. Most of our students come from abroad for a defined period of time after which they return to the Diaspora (often to be involved in Jewish education). Aish HaTorah staff and students who do settle in Israel are encouraged to fulfill their obligations to the State, including service in the Israel Defense Forces.

7. Aish HaTorah condemns violence against Jews and non-Jews in Israel. We unequivocally oppose violent demonstrations, including stone throwing, flag burning, and other vulgar acts claimed in the name of religion, or any other disrespectful behaviour against the State.

8. We welcome all Jews of all affiliations, beliefs, and traditions to come to learn. We are educators. We explain what Judaism is about. Our goal is to build bridges and encourage dialogue among all Jews.

9. Aish HaTorah's policy and practice is to refrain from endorsing, supporting or involving ourselves in any political issues in Israel. We have no affiliation nor express support for any political party in Israel or elsewhere.

10. There is no Aish HaTorah political policy on the peace process or any other political issue. Everyone is entitled to their own opinion. We don't dictate. Our educational mission is seen as essential by our supporters, who come from all segments of the political and religious spectrum.

Aish HaTorah's business is teaching Jews about Judaism. Period. That's a full enough order and we embrace the challenge.

Conversion bill angers non-Orthodox Jews

a vote of 51-32, with seven abstentions. If passed in current form, the bill would formalize existing practices, in which only Orthodox rabbis perform conversions.

The law banning non-Orthodox Jews from regional religious councils has yet to be tabled in the Knesset.

Both pieces of legislation have raised the ire of Reform and Conservative Jews the world over.

In addition to two recent meetings with Sultan, Canadian Reform Jews have sent letters and e-mail to Netanyahu, urging him to back off from the bills, Anshan said.

Included in one of Arza's meetings with the ambassador were representatives of Mercaz, the Conservative movement's Zionist arm.

"We've been asked to ease off by our people in Israel in order to give the commission some time," Mercaz Canada president Norm Stern told The CJN. "We won't be doing anything in Canada unless we're informed otherwise."

Conservative Jews and congregations in this country have also sent letters of protest to Netanyahu, Stern said. One Toronto congregation sent a 300-name petition.

Stern said one good sign coming from Israel is that the Sephardi Chief Rabbi, Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron, has sent an envoy to the Ne'eman commission. "That marks the first time [the Orthodox] have expressed a willingness to reach an accommodation," Stern noted.

Last week's meeting between Arza and Sultan included Anshan; Rabbi Dow Marmur, former president of Arzenu, the International Federation of Reform Zionists; and Rabbi Paul Golomb, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism.

Their statement to the ambassador said Reform considers the law on religious councils "an attack on the integrity and commitment of millions of Jews worldwide who have channelled their religious expression through synagogues and practices that are not Orthodox."

In a statement read to The CJN, Jack Kahn, the president of Mizrachi Canada, the Orthodox movement's Zionist arm, said his movement "fully back the efforts of the Ne'eman commission to find an acceptable solution to this vexing conversion problem that will bridge the rift of the world Jewish community, and will, at the same time, conform to tradition and Halachah."

REFORM RABBI PRAISES CONVERSION COMPROMISE

A leader figure in Israel's Reform movement is calling a proposed solution to the ongoing religious conversion controversy "groundbreaking."

Rabbi Robert Samuels, in Toronto last week for a UJA Federation speaking tour, described the report of Israel's Ne'eman committee as an "astounding breakthrough."

The committee, headed by Israel's Finance Minister Yaakov Ne'eman, recommended that Conservative and Reform rabbis be permitted to prepare people for conversion through an organization established by the Jewish Agency. However, the conversions themselves would be carried out under Orthodox auspices. The committee would also allow non-Orthodox rabbis to participate in marriage ceremonies, with the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate providing two valid witnesses, according to halacha (religious law).

Initially, Orthodox, Conservative and Reform representatives reacted poorly to the suggested compromise, but all have agreed to give the Ne'eman committee three more months to come up with something even more acceptable.

Without a compromise, the Israeli government has threatened to proceed with legislation enshrining the religious status quo under which weddings and conversions in Israel are solely under Orthodox jurisdiction. The bill, which is opposed by UJA Federation, does not affect conversions anywhere else in the world.

If the Ne'eman committee's current recommendations were implemented, Rabbi Samuels said he would have no problem living with them. "I'm ready to officiate at those marriages and let someone else be the 'marrying Sam'," he told a UJA Federation meeting. "I'm ready to train Russian people who are half Jews, quarter Jews or one-eighth Jews and have someone else officiate at their conversions." In Israel, he already officiates at weddings, with an Orthodox rabbi ensuring that the witnesses, the ketubah (marriage document) and the ceremony strictly correspond to halacha.

Rabbi Robert Samuels

Rabbi Samuels praised UJA Federation for its work on behalf of Jews in need everywhere. "There is no power in the Jewish world," he said, "that can match the power of United Jewish Appeal in being a spokesperson for the Jewish people. As a Reform leader, I don't feel apart from you. I feel with you in what you do."

But Rabbi Samuels warned North American Jewry not to take the conversion issue lightly, calling it "an international emergency."

"There's a seismic shift happening in the Jewish world," he claimed. "There's a volcano under there and it may erupt unless certain things are done to change the environment."

The biggest change, he believes, is guaranteeing Israelis religious choice. "From the days of the French revolution and the American revolution, Jews have choices and you cannot coerce Jews away from those choices," he said.

Rabbi Samuels, born in Atlanta and raised in Texas, was the first North American Reform rabbi to move to Israel where, in 1962, he started a congregation in Upper Nazareth. Since 1986, he has been headmaster of Haifa's Leo Baeck school.

More money for programs promoting tolerance

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), funded by UJA Federations across North America, will be spending at least $20 million (U.S.) next year - an unprecedented sum of money - on projects supporting tolerance and Jewish unity.

This year, JAFI has allocated $18.5 million for such initiatives, some of which are backed by Conservative, Orthodox or Reform religious streams. Others, for which the Agency has set aside nearly $6 million, are unaffiliated.

Jewish Agency programs foster understanding among Jews.

"The Jewish Agency is the largest supporter of such projects in the world," said UJA Federation president Joseph Steiner. "They reinforce the respect, understanding and dignity which every Jew deserves, regardless of affiliation."

The Jewish Agency also extends financial support to organizations helping Israelis in difficult or desperate situations. Funding recipients in this category include:

- The Sexual Assault Victim Witness Assistance Program
- Breast Cancer Outreach and Education Association for the Advancement of Women's Health
- Pluralistic Heritage Discovery

JAFI is the primary force behind the rescue of Jews in distress and their resettlement in Israel. This year, the Jewish Agency is spending nearly $226 million on worldwide rescue efforts. Through the Jewish Agency, some 800,000 Jews have taken flight from the former Soviet Union since 1989.

It's HOT to help

Community Matters

UJA FEDERATION PROVIDES FUNDS FOR CULTURE

UJA Federation is turning to the arts as a vehicle for increasing Jewish awareness, by awarding more than $30,000 in grants to projects concentrating on Jewish culture. UJA Federation has already provided over $300,000 to more than 50 community-based programs to strengthen Jewish identity. Eight cultural initiatives from photographic exhibits to a book of Jewish feminist writings received between $1,000 and $5,000. The Action Committee for Jewish Continuity selected the winners from a huge number of submissions.

Spotlight on Yiddishkeit

Know a song or two in Yiddish? Not afraid of being in the spotlight? Then Centre Spotlight is the venue for you. The once a month nightclub at the Morris Winchevsky School, 585 Cranbrooke Avenue, showcases a diverse range of Jewish talent including singers, musicians, dancers, and comedians.

Actress Gloria Valentine, founder of the Jewish Artists Scholarship Society, says the shows offer audiences a truly professional performance enhanced by high quality sound and lighting, a stage and even a rising curtain. "It's very important that Jewish performers be seen in the best possible light," explains Valentine.

Anyone interested in taking centre stage at an upcoming Spotlight show can contact Gloria Valentine at (416) 638-2222.

Bloor JCC Reaches Out

Jewish life is thriving at the corner of Spadina and Bloor thanks to innovative programming at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

Downtown Jews, from all walks of life, have been increasingly participating in a variety of Bloor JCC programs, including a Film Society, Books and Bagels, Between Stages, Playwriting Contest, Centre Court Cabaret and Art Talks.

Funds provided by UJA Federation will be used to promote what's going on in the Bloor JCC to Jewish "downtowners."

Purely Jewish Theatre

A Jewish play based on Jewish text. That's what four local performance artists are working on thanks to funding from UJA Federation. The theatre production, inspired by the "Song of Songs" is meant to be a "celebration of Jewish texts, history, music and spirit in a contemporary context," explains actor/producer Alon Nashman.

The play will be aimed at an adult audience with a particular focus on university students. "We want to engage young people to learn more about their Jewish heritage," adds Nashman. Both the Theatre Passe Muraille and Tarragon Theatre have expressed interest in the play.

Neshama

Producer/director David Stein says he got the inspiration for his film Neshama from his bubi's love of Yiddish. The documentary explores the Yiddish revival taking place around the world from a personal viewpoint, with what Stein calls "a 20th century spin."

Stein, who is working together with Jesse Rosensweet and Karen Shopsowitz on the film, will use footage of participants in the Ashkenaz Festival and the KlezCanada Camp in the Laurentians, which he visited last summer. "Yiddish is full of hidden treasures," explains Stein. "It's the key to our heritage and something for us to be very proud of."

Theatre Asylum

A popular, critically acclaimed play by Hungarian Holocaust survivor George Tabori has been a big hit, especially among Toronto's younger crowd. My Mother's Courage, depicting the struggle of a Jewish housewife living in Hungary during World War II, just completed a two week run.

Theatre Asylum, which produced the play, will now use funding provided by UJA Federation to mount a production of Tabori's latest work, The Ballad of Weiner Schnitzel.

Jewish Women's Voices

The organizers of two highly successful Jewish feminist conferences, attended by over 500 women, are now publishing the proceedings in order to reach a wider audience. "Jewish Women's Voices: From Memory to Transformation," to be launched at the Jewish Book Fair, will include 20 works with a female perspective on everything from the Holocaust to Jewish immigration.

"The book will not be a formal record of the proceedings," explains Margy Wolfe, one of the editors. "It will be a readable, accessible volume of unique and varied writings." The publishers plan to distribute the book throughout North America.

Exploring Jewish Identity

Poet Rafi Aron will combine his own poetry with provocative photos taken by some of the world's most talented photographers in an exploration of Jewish identity.

Aron's work, A Seed in the Pocket of Their Blood, appearing at the 1997 Jewish Book Fair, as well as a future downtown location, will feature photographs by David Rubinger, from TIME Magazine, Serge Clemont and Ruth Kaplan. "I feel this is an informal, yet effective way to expose a wide range of people to crucial Jewish issues," explains Aron. Some of the themes echoed in Aron's exhibit are Jewish immigration, anti-semitism and the Holocaust.

Photos Personalize Holocaust

John Massier, curator of the Koffler Gallery, hopes Jason Schwartz's photographs leave a lasting impression. Schwartz's annotated photos of Holocaust survivors will be on exhibit until mid-December in the Loggia Gallery at the Koffler Centre in the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

"It personalizes this episode in Jewish history instead of presenting it in only broad terms," explains Massier. As part of the exhibit's educational component, Massier is inviting students from grade school to university to submit their own photo of a Holocaust survivor using Schwartz's revealing methodology as a model.

A STEADY DIET OF HUNGER

Now that's food for thought.

Over 200,000 elderly Jews in the former Soviet Union suffer from unrelenting hunger.
The Joint Distribution Committee, assisted by United Israel Appeal, through UJA/CJA campaigns across Canada, has enough money to provide only 70,000 desperate people with subsistence packages.
It doesn't take a lot to help. Just $18 a month will finance a food survival kit.
The same $18 that buys a business lunch, 2 movie tickets or 30 litres of gas.
When your CJA/UJA campaigner contacts you, please consider the astounding number of Jews who go to bed hungry every night.

Now that's food for thought.

Entebbe rescue pilot to address fundraiser

TORONTO — The man who flew the lead plane in Israel's daring 1976 raid on the Entebbe airport in Uganda will be a guest speaker at a fundraiser here for the Israel Air Force Museum.

Brig.-Gen. (Res.) Joshua Shani, later an Israeli Air Force attache to Washington, will appear at the dinner along with Brig.-Gen. (Res.) Ya'akov Terner, commander of the museum. It will take place at the Royal Ontario Museum, Nov. 16 at 6:30 p.m.

The Boeing 707 Shani piloted in the Entebbe rescue is among the permanent exhibits in the museum, located on the Hatzerim Air Force Base near Beersheva.

Terner was a squadron commander during the Six Day War, the War of Attrition and the Yom Kippur War.

Dinner chair is John Serenyi, former chair and CEO of Green Forest Lumber, and an avid pilot.

Serenyi immigrated to Israel from his native Hungary in 1948 and although he held a pilot's license, he drove a halftrack in the 1956 Sinai campaign.

The museum, opened in 1991, has attracted thousands from around the world. On display are more than 100 vintage fighter planes from all of Israel's wars, helicopters, rare photos and even a piece of a Scud missile.

For information on the dinner, call 416-489-3336.

Bund marks 100 years with nostalgic bash

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About 100 members of the Bund shared memories of their life in Poland, Russia and Lithuania at a recent banquet held at the Workmen's Circle marking the Bund's 100th jubilee.

"It was nostalgia plus," said Aron Fainer, Toronto Bund chair, of the gathering that observed the Bund's founding in 1897 in Vilna, Poland, then a centre of intellectual and political life.

Prof. Jack Jacobs, speaking in Yiddish and English, recalled the key role Bund members played in the Warsaw Ghetto uprising and in other resistance to the Nazis in World War II.

He spoke of the political ferment in eastern Europe which led to a number of Yiddish socialist groups coming together to form the Bund. It was among the leaders in alerting Jews to the dangers posed by Hitler

It was also a leader in the secular movements which sought to improve the lot of Jewish workers.

"Unfortunately 90 percent of Bundists were killed by the Nazis," said Fainer.

The Toronto Bund was formed in 1948 and has held an annual celebration ever since. There are also Bunds in the United States, Australia, Israel, Central and South America, whose members frequently visit friends in Toronto.

Entertainment included recitations from stories by famed Yiddish writers David Einhorn, Avi Raisin and Vladimir Meden, and performances by two Montreal singers.

JWI honors past president for her volunteer work

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For only the second time in 41 years, Jewish Women International of Toronto (JWI) has named one of its own as Woman of the Year, in recognition of the work she has done for the organization.

Lucille Bensky, a JWI member for almost 40 years, and a past national and Toronto Council president, will be honored at the organization's 41st Covenant Breakfast, Nov. 9, 10 a.m., at Richmond Hill Golf and Country Club.

Among her accomplishments within JWI, Bensky spearheaded and coordinated the city's Tay Sachs clinics in the early 1970s, which screened potential carriers of the genetic disease.

"In over nine months, we tested 12,000 people and as a result almost eradicated the birth of Jewish babies with Tay Sachs," she said in a recent interview.

An avid knitter, Bensky was the first chair of the Mountains of Mittens campaign, an ongoing project that has JWI members knitting mittens and scarves for needy children from North York schools. In the past year, over 2,000 pairs of mittens have been distributed.

JWI's Share Your Love campaign, also spearheaded by Bensky, had members collecting loonies in film canisters. The organization raised $20,000, all of which went to its resident treatment centre outside of Jerusalem.

Bensky joined JWI (then B'nai Brith) as a young bride, she said, to make friends. "I discovered, however, that community volunteer service was my love and I have since focused on that."

Having experienced the history of the organization "from its days as B'nai Brith, B'nai Brith Women and now JWI, I have seen it move forward and keep up with the times. It has continuously refocused and directed itself to meet members' needs.

"JWI has kept up with issues such as gun control, the get, breast cancer, intermarriage and domestic violence that are vital to all Canadian women. This is what has kept me as a member. It is an organization of the '90s and it has changed with every decade."

Doing community volunteer work, says Bensky, "is an extension of myself. I have to be helping other people. I get great satisfaction from knowing that something is better because I have contributed."

She acknowledges that being a volunteer now is harder than it ever has been. "I salute women who find the time in their schedule. They do gain so much, however. They are able to get away from their everyday concerns and get a broader scope of what is going on in the world.

"As well members can hone their leadership skills and gain self-confidence and a great deal of satisfaction. I am a completely other person than when I joined the organization. I have the satisfaction of knowing that I have contributed something – not a lot in total, but I have made a difference."

Other positions Bensky has held in the community include being a member of the boards of Jewish Camp Council, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Jewish Community Centre and Canada Israel Committee.

PROJECT DIRECTOR:
Expressions Of Interest

The Committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation invites consultants to submit expressions of interest in undertaking an exciting, challenging project that will lead to the establishment of a Toronto Yiddish Education Centre. Under the direction of the Committee, the consultant will facilitate:

- The creation of an interim Board of Directors for the developmental phase of the proposed Centre. The Board's functions will include fundraising, marketing, (Yiddish) education, organizational development and other relevant fields.
- The development of a strategic plan for the proposed Centre.
- The development of a plan for the implementation of all elements of the strategic plan.

The consultant must have substantial experience in strategic planning, organizational development and fundraising. He/she must have extensive knowledge of the structure and workings of the Toronto Jewish community, and a significant network of contacts among the many cultural, social, religious and other elements that make up that community. The consultant also must have a sense of the centrality of Yiddish education to Jewish continuity. A capacity to speak Yiddish and experience in educational administration, while desirable, are not required.

Consultants who wish to consider undertaking this project and want to learn more about it are invited to submit expressions of interest indicating their qualifications. Those whose expressions of interest are deemed appropriate will be sent "requests for proposals" containing a more detailed description of the project and specifications for the preparation of their project proposals.

Expressions of interest must be received by no later than November 28, 1997. They should be addressed to:

Parchment, Ottawa writer share in Journey Prize

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Gabriella Goliger of Ottawa is one of two writers to share the $10,000 Journey Prize for her story Maladies Of The Inner Ear, which appeared in the 1996-97 issue of the journal Parchment: Contemporary Canadian Jewish Writing.

Goliger shares the award with Nova Scotia writer Anne Simpson, whose story Dreaming Snow appeared in The Fiddlehead. The two journals with the winning stories share $2,000 in recognition of their important role as incubators of Canadian literary talent. The prize was awarded on the opening night of the Harbourfront International Authors Festival.

Goliger, a freelance writer and editor, said it has given her new impetus to complete a collection of short stories "that draw on my heritage, which is German-Jewish." She expects to have the anthology ready within a year.

Gabriella Goliger

Maladies Of The Inner Ear tells the story of an elderly German-Jewish woman who suffers from tinnitus, a medical condition involving a loud and inescapable ringing in her ears. She is also tormented by memories of her youth in Germany and the brother who did not get out in time.

"The tinnitus works as a kind of metaphor for the inescapable pain and sorrow that comes back to haunt her in her old age," Goliger said.

Parchment editor Adam Fuerstenberg, a professor in the English department of Ryerson Polytechnic University in Toronto, said the $1,000 prize for the journal "is very helpful, because journals hang in there by the skin of their teeth."

Parchment serves a special function for the Jewish literary community in Canada, he said, since it exists in response to "the difficulty of publishing stories with Jewish content in the established journals."

The Journey Prize is one of the most significant monetary awards given in Canada to beginning writers. It was established by McClelland & Stewart, the Toronto-based publishers, through funds donated by the late author James Michener from the Canadian royalties of his 1988 novel Journey.

The prestigious award boosts the profile of Parchment as its editors and contributors prepare to launch the 1997-98 issue on Nov. 9, 3:30 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre, as part of Toronto's annual Jewish Book Fair.

At the launch party, which is called Prose & Poetry at the Cafe Kasrilevke, authors Seymour Mayne, Murray Pomerance, Ken Sherman, Ruth Panofsky, Nathalie Stephens and Libby Scheier will read from their respective works.

A one-year subscription to Parchment is $12; two years, $20. Write to: Centre for Jewish Studies, Vanier 260, York University, 4700 Keele St., North York, Ont., M3J 1P3.

Mazon launches poster contest

TORONTO — Mazon Canada, which bills itself as "a Jewish response to hunger," has launched its first ever teen poster contest.

The juried poster contest is open to Canadian youth aged 15 to 19. Entries must reflect on one or both of the following themes: the tragedy of hunger and poverty in Canada, or the traditional Jewish value of tzedakah.

The purpose of the contest is to offer young people the opportunity to express a personal, political or religious message through art, with regard to hunger in Canada .

Entries must be submitted by Dec. 1 to the Mazon Canada offices at 788 Marlee Ave., Suite 206. For an application form or for more information, call 416-783-7554.

Reena supervisor helps ensure 'positive changes'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If Maureen Ander had her way, most people with developmental handicaps would be living in the community.

As a supervisor at two of Reena's residential locations, as well as a day program job site and a workshop at the Minnie Wagman Centre, Ander says that one of Reena's mandates is to try and take people out of institutions such as Huronia in Orillia or Oxford in Barrie and place them in a group home within the Jewish community.

Maureen Ander

Historically, she says, when children were born with a disabilities, families were told to put them in an institution. "Only recently did people begin to realize that alternatives do exist. People with developmental handicaps do well living in a community setting where they can meet neighbors, go to synagogue and spend time at home learning life skills. Reena homes offer varying levels of supervision from semi-independent all the way to 24-hour-a-day care.

"We are not exclusively Jewish, but we do have a Jewish environment. Our homes are kosher and we run Jewish programs. Many of our residences had sukkot this year. That is what makes us different from other agencies. Jewish residents can live in a Jewish environment."

Ander, who started at Reena eight years ago as a front-line worker, says "I sense a change in how the community responds to people with developmental disabilities. When we would go on a bus seven or eight years ago, people would stare at us. Now, people know about Reena and the work we do. The group of us is not as scary."

She says that the staff in the homes work at bonding with the residents but "definitely do not replace family. We are realistic. Staff come and go. They are responsible for the needs of its residents as well as for services and programming, but we always encourage family and friends to visit and invite residents home for the holidays. We also urge families to plan for the lives of residents for when [families] are no longer around. There are a lot of aging parents."

In the summer, Ander supervised Reena's cottage program that offers a two-week cottage vacation to Reena clients, as well as to people on Reena's resource list.

"We reached out to people who are not yet receiving our services. Six or seven people per session had a typical summer experience in one of two chalets in Collingwood. This is something that most clients would not have an opportunity to do. It really worked out beautifully."

The most fulfilling part of her job, says Ander, is seeing a change in people from when they first came to Reena. "I remember what they were like when I first met them and I see a positive change. A major part of my role is seeing that that change continues."

Architect hopes to launch archeological field school

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Architect Sander Gladstone set to submerge in Caesarea's harbor.

TORONTO — Toronto architect Sander Gladstone has become part of an archeological scuba team working underwater to excavate three ancient sites in the harbor of Caesarea, Israel, a Mediterranean port city dating back to 2,200 BCE.

Gladstone (no relation), who heads an architectural practice and lectures at York University, heard about the Caesaria project last summer and wasted no time volunteering his services. "I e-mailed them — 'I'm an architect, a university professor, fluent in Hebrew, and a scuba diver, and I'm creating a course that uses case studies from biblical Israel. Can I come join your underwater archaeological team?'"

He spent three weeks helping to retrieve artifacts from the water. On days when the sea was too rough, he worked on a land dig of a temple dedicated to Augustus Caesar, the Roman emperor after whom the city was named, and for whom the temple was built by King Herod circa 10 BCE.

The Romans built up the settlement at Caesaria because they needed a port, Gladstone said. The city has been continuously occupied for more than 2,000 years, and had a population of more than 100,000 inhabitants at its peak.

"The Jewish revolt started in Caesaria," he said. "Caesaria was the seat of the [Roman] government at the time. I want to change the perceptions of Canadian Jewish travellers, who will hit Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, the Galilee, Masada, and perhaps Eilat. I want them to make Caesaria a major stop as well. It has beautiful beaches, major hotels, and fascinating archeological artifacts."

Gladstone intends to establish a field school at the University of Toronto School of Architecture through which students will go to Israel in summers to work on the dig in Caesaria. He is seeking a benefactor to help establish the field school.

Born in Canada 40 years ago, Gladstone left Forest Hill Collegiate after Grade 10 and finished high school in Israel. He was there during the Yom Kippur War of 1973 and served as a volunteer in the army.

Licensed to practice both in Canada and Israel, Gladstone has several high-profile projects in both countries. In Toronto, he is presently refurbishing a former theatre, the Bayview Playhouse, retaining its art-deco architectural qualities as he transforms it into a supermarket and commercial space. In Eilat, he is helping to design a surgical centre where Europeans and others can come for cosmetic and other elective surgery, then recuperate in an idyllic setting.

Gladstone is also an artist. Recently, a retrospective showing of his paintings went on view at The Rosedale Diner, 1164 Yonge St., where they will be displayed until early December.

Anyone interested in the Caesaria project may contact him by phoning 416-482-5100 or by e-mail at [rktect@yorku.ca].

Stanford professor wins Nobel Prize

By DOUG SETO
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO — Stanford University finance professor Myron S. Scholes, who won the Nobel Prize for economics, already has an idea of what he will do with his $500,000 in prize money.

And given his line of work, his plan is hardly surprising. "In general," he said, "I will spend some of it and save the rest by placing it in broad diversified portfolios of securities."

Scholes, 53, won the award for co-pioneering a formula that simplified the process of purchasing stock options.

Scholes' colleague, Robert C. Merton of Harvard University, will receive the other half of the $1 million prize. By winning the award, Scholes became the second Jew to win a Nobel Prize in the last two weeks.

Stanley Prusiner, a recipient of Israel's prestigious Wolf Award, received the Nobel Prize in medicine for his work on brain-wasting diseases.

Scholes, an emeritus professor at Stanford, is one of two scholars at the university to receive a Nobel Prize this year. (A Nobel in physics went to Steven Chu for his work in cooling atoms with lasers.) After winning the prize, Scholes told reporters that he was speechless, honored and ecstatic. The shock hadn't worn off the day after, when he was reached by phone.

"When I woke up this morning, I was still on cloud nine," he said. "It still hasn't sunk in yet, but maybe later – perhaps in a couple of weeks."

Management L.P. He also finds time for golf and skiing.

Scholes' approach to skiing gives insight into the drive that helped produce his prize-winning work, according to his sister-in-law, Susan Scholes of Princeton, N.J.

"When Myron learned to ski, he took a very scholarly approach and bought hundreds of video tapes and books on skiing," she said.

In Greenwich, Scholes attends services at Temple Shalom, a Conservative synagogue. In Stanford, he attends Congregation Beth Am, his former synagogue in Los Altos Hills.

Rabbi Richard Block of Beth Am, said of Scholes, "He is a most intelligent and witty man."

In the history of Beth Am, Rabbi Block said, four of its members have won Nobel Prizes.

Scholes was born in Ontario

Now a resident of Greenwich, Conn., Scholes was born in Ontario. His childhood role models, he said, were not sports figures or glitzy Hollywood stars. Instead, his heroes were his parents, who are both now deceased.

"My parents were very important to me and encouraged me in everything I did," he said. "They helped share and develop my love of economics."

Scholes, who joined the Stanford Business School faculty in 1981 and became a professor emeritus in 1996, now spends most of his time operating his successful Greenwich investment firm, Long-Term Capital

Historian's review concerns CJC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An academic exercise by a historian could turn into a political football for the Ministry of Justice, thanks to the choice of publication partner for the historian's critique of Daniel Goldhagen's book, Hitler's Willing Executioners.

Canadian Jewish Congress is questioning the propriety of the publication of a review by Ruth Bettina Birn, chief historian of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, in a book that will feature the work of a rabidly anti-Zionist academic, Norman Finkelstein. The proposed book is to be published in the United States next March by Henry Holt.

The son of Holocaust survivors, Finkelstein is a longstanding ideological opponent of Israel. He has attacked the legitimacy of the Jewish state and according to the Forward newspaper in New York, he has characterized Goldhagen as a Zionist propagandist who distorts evidence to support the legitimacy of the State of Israel.

Following a 1992 forum at Queen's University in Kingston, Ont., Finkelstein, an adjunct professor of international relations at Hunter College, wrote to the campus newspaper comparing Israeli "apologists" to "the Gestapo." At a 1996 student forum at Fairfield University in Connecticut, Finkelstein compared Israel's 1948 war of independence to "ethnic cleansing." He also compared Israel's conquest of the Palestinians to methods used by the Nazis, Australians, South Africans and Americans to dispossess native peoples.

"I find it very peculiar behavior on the part of a public servant in the war crimes unit to be associated with Finkelstein at the time the unit is being investigated for anti-Semitism," said Irving Abella, chair of Congress' war crimes committee.

"[Bettina Birn] is entitled to her views of Goldhagen…but I think she should withdraw her work and not be associated with Finkelstein."

The investigation Abella was referring followed in the wake of comments made last spring by Bill Hobson, former head of the war crimes unit. He suggested the legal advice of Justice Department lawyer Arnold Fradkin, a member of the unit, was considered suspect because he is Jewish.

John Sims, assistant deputy attorney general, acknowledges that Congress raised "an important issue." But, he said, "Finkelstein's views are not my views or Bettina Birn's views or views connected with anyone in the war crimes unit."

Bettina Birn's critique of the Goldhagen book was first published in academic circles by the Cambridge University Press. "It's a fine piece and we'd like to see it available to a broader readership," Sims said.

"I've come to see Finkelstein as controversial. His views are provocative and some of his views give offense. It would be a pity if the controversy of his views taint the excellence of Bettina Birn's work," he added.

Sims said he is still attempting to acquire more information about Finkelstein, but he acknowledged that "there are principles that apply to public servants and to those in our world, to ensure that our ability to do our jobs and the public confidence in that ability is not affected."

USDS CARDS BRIGHTEN SENIORS' DAY

Jordan Ockrant, a student at United Synagogue Day School's Richmond Hill campus, recently presented his great-grandfather, 93-year-old Morris Ockrant, a resident of Baycrest, with a card produced in the computer lab at USDS. Students in all grades designed and produced cards for Rosh Hashanah and Sukkot. They were delivered by Senior Care to senior citizens receiving kosher meals on wheels.

Israel Yiddish festival set

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The worldwide resurgence of interest in Yiddish, ranging from mameloshen groups to klezmer music festivals, is taking place even in Israel, where a second International Yiddish Festival is being planned for this winter.

In another era, a week-long festival devoted to Yiddish might have made Eliezer Ben Yehuda and David Ben-Gurion spin in their graves.

Ben Yehuda wrote the first modern Hebrew dictionary in an effort to make it Israel's own lingua franca . Ben-Gurion, who spoke fluent Yiddish himself, regularly reproached people who used it.

But times they are a-changin', suggests former Montrealer Ella Gaffen, who is organizing the Dec. 28 to Jan. 4, 1998, festival and tour, which will be conducted entirely in Yiddish and be centred at the Neve Ilan Hilltop Resort near Jerusalem, where she is marketing and sales manager.

"It is a true cultural experience," said Gaffen, who is the daughter of Dora Wasserman, founder of the Yiddish Theatre of the Saidye Bronfman Centre (SBC).

"There is a great hope, a recognition within Israel that Yiddish has to be continued."

"It's about transmitting culture through language," said Gaffen's sister, Bryna Wasserman, who took over as artistic director of the Yiddish Theatre after her mother suffered a stroke almost three years ago.

"The charm of this festival is that of being in Israel at the same time, the feeling of belonging. You just can't have that same emotion or the touching experience in another country."

Indeed, Yiddish in Israel seems to be sparking an interest it never did before, ironically catching up with the rest of the world. Gaffen considers Israel to be the homeland not only of the Jewish people, but of Yiddish too.

The country has its mameloshen group, called Dor Hemshech ("next generation"), which is helping to organize the festival.

Thirty-four Israeli high schools offer Yiddish courses, as do institutions of higher learning like Hebrew, Bar-Ilan and Tel Aviv universities.

In Ashkelon, a 20-member choir sings in Yiddish. Tel Aviv has a Yiddish-language book store. Yiddish kreizen (circles) proliferate. Japanese students have studied Yiddish in Israel. And the Israeli government has officially deemed Yiddish a "recognized" language.

So the festival seems a natural outgrowth of the Yiddish boon in Israel, as well as Gaffen's own personal sensibility and the general Wasserman family commitment to Yiddishkeit.

The festival last year, which she became determined to launch after her mother became ill, drew about 100 participants from around the world, including 10 to 15 Canadians, Gaffen said.

Ambitions this year are just as high, if not higher.

The festival will feature tours, lectures by eminent scholars, readings from Israeli Yiddish writers, seminars, concerts and films,with participants expected from (besides the United States and Canada) Germany, France, Holland and Belgium.

The festival, whose sponsors include Israel's Tourism Ministry and the municipality of Jerusalem, will even feature a Yiddish "monologue" competition.

Already, Gaffen noted, the festival has sparked international interest at the e-mail addresses of Neve Ilan [neve-ilan@kibbutz.co.il] and of North American contact Shirley Gonshor of Montreal, herself a long-time Yiddish promoter and 30-year member of the Yiddish. Her e-mail address is [agonsh@po-box.mcgill.ca].

Gonshor can also be reached at 514-482-0097 and 514-489-9517.

Lynden couple celebrates 50 years on the farm

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

LYNDEN, Ont. — As Joe and Minna Loewith celebrate their 50th anniversary on their farm, they look back with pride on a life that has brought them satisfaction and the knowledge that they have contributed to the progress of the dairy industry of their adopted country.

It did not look promising in September 1947, when Joe bought the "neglected, 94-acre dairy farm with a herd of 90 non-descript cattle," from his brother-in-law, the late Rabbi Elias Zwetschkenbaum. But the couple was determined to make a success of it.

Eleven years earlier, they had arrived in Canada with a group of 38 refugees from Czechoslovakia, led by Minna's uncle, Karl Abeles. Abeles and Minna's father Leo, along with their brothers, had managed an estate in Sudetenland. Their farming experience was their ticket to Canada, and Minna says she is convinced that Canadian immigration officials who visited them before granting the visas, did not know they were Jews.

Joe, with farming skills gained in Canada as a hired hand, transformed his property into a large and flourishing concern that is now a model dairy farm visited by delegations from all over the world. Minna raised their three sons and helped wherever and whenever necessary.

"It was a lot of hard work but very gratifying," she said in an interview. "The fact that we could see we were getting ahead made it all worthwhile."

Her three sons hold degrees in agriculture. Carl, a past president of Temple Anshe Sholom and incoming president of Shalom Village, and David, a past JCC president, remained on the family farm and now run it. Harry is in the cattle business.

Carl and David have been named Farmers of the Year for Wentworth County, and the family received the 1988 Centennial Award for "outstanding service to agriculture and the food industry," marking the Ontario Ministry of Agriculture and Food's 100th anniversary. In 1991, David and his wife Bonnie, a family physician, became the first Jewish couple to be named Outstanding Young Farmers of Canada.

E-mail forum planned for small communities

TORONTO — From Timmins to Niagara Falls, Ontario Jews living in 28 small communities across the province will be able to improve communications in handling shared concerns via an e-mail forum organized by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC).

The e-mail forum is being set up "as a means by which persons living in the Diaspora or the heartland of Ontario" can better exchange information, says Dr. Michael Sobol of Guelph, co-chair of the regional community services committee.

"Given the difficulty in bringing together people living across Ontario, and the fact that more and more people are using electronic mail, we felt it was time to organize an e-mail user group," Sobol says.

CJC has sent out letters asking people to participate. They will receive, print, photocopy and distribute e-mail to the community. People who wish to get involved should e-mail Jennifer Turack, Ontario region's director of community services and youth activities at [turack@ibm.net]. The forum moderator will send questions and comments on e-mail to community representatives for feedback.

The new e-mail forum is just one of the many programs and services offered by CJC to small communities:

• Education Consultancy Services are provided to as many as 40 Jewish day and supplementary schools throughout the Ontario region outside Greater Toronto. CJC staff, working with teachers, principals and lay leaders, offer help through school visits, professional development day speakers, placement services, regional conferences, curriculum formulation, and development and distribution of educational materials.

On Nov. 9, all schools in the region have been invited to participate in a professional development day for supplementary school and day school teachers in Toronto.

The region aims to strengthen the Jewish identity of children, teens and young adults in the province's smaller centres, and develop a strong liaison with them. With campus Jewish groups, CJC staff delivers services and helps them formulate programs and activities.

• CJC organizes the annual Council of University Presidents (CUP) Conference that brings together presidents of Jewish university groups and members of their executives once a year in a small community during a weekend to discuss leadership development, Jewish issues on campus, religious pluralism and upcoming programming events.

• On Nov. 19, the region is co-sponsoring a Jewish Life on Campus Fair at the Thornhill community Centre, 7755 Bayview Ave., for parents and future university students, who will be able to meet admissions representatives from 14 Ontario universities as well as Jewish student representatives.

• The fifth cycle of the High School Outreach Program offering a comprehensive education and Judaism program to Ontario teenagers began this fall. Having grown up in small, predominantly non-Jewish environments, many of the participants have spoken about feelings of isolation and incidents of discrimination.

This three-year education program provides teenagers with a comfortable environment in which to express themselves Jewishly, says Turack. It runs on a three-year cycle offering a comprehensive education about Judaism. Instruction is provided by CJC staff through home visits, meetings in communities and twice yearly Shabbatonim. The program culminates in its final year with a five-week summer experience in Israel.

• The region's Family Educational Outreach Project is geared to families with children up to bar/bat mitzvah age. The program involves delivery of home study materials, staff visits to communities to run Oneg Shabbats and programs, and a yearly family Shabbat retreat.

• At B'nai Jacob Congregation in Niagara Falls, CJC is organizing a Southern Ontario family weekend entitled, Angels and Zionists – Celebrating Shabbat and Israel at 50, at the synagogue, Nov. 14 to 16.

• CJC is co-sponsoring an Israel at 50 program that is being brought to small communities by Toronto-based shlichim (emissaries) from Israeli youth movements and the Canada-Israel Experience Centre.

• The region also is instituting a pen pal program for children living in small communities, says Turack. Enrolment forms are available from CJC for the youngsters who detail their age, interests and what they are looking for in a pen pal.

For more information on these programs and activities, please contact Turack at 416-635-2883, ext. 152, or Rosen at ext. 139.

Sharon Home dedicates special needs unit

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Sharon Home, Winnipeg's Jewish nursing home, recently dedicated its new Bet Chai (House of Life) Special Needs Unit, a state-of-the-art facility for those who are cognitively impaired by Alzheimer disease or other disorders.

The unit on the Sharon Home's top floor has a luxurious feel. The lounge has been furnished to look like a residential living room and has ergonomically designed seating, a lot of natural light and floor areas clearly demarcated by different colors to help residents navigate the space.

The renovations, which cost over $200,000 were completed in 15 weeks. The project was funded by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, four other Winnipeg-based foundations and the contributions of several families with relations who are or were residents of the Home.

In planning the project, Sharon Home staff visited a number of other special needs units in Manitoba and consulted with the Alzheimer's Society of Manitoba and the Deer Lodge Hospital psycho-geriatric team.

The special needs unit currently has 14 patients with cognitive impairment or behavioral problems.

At the same time that work was being done on the fifth floor, a parallel renovation was in progress on the first floor on the residence's new 120-seat Garden Cafe. The kosher, buffet-style cafe was dedicated in early October and will be open to the public as well as to staff members and residents at the end of the month.

The restaurant replaces an eating area where food was provided mainly from vending machines. The menu includes soups, salads, sandwiches, bagels, pastries, beverages and daily specials.

The Garden Cafe is open six days a week from 8:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Profits will go to subsidizing other Sharon Home programs.

Vancouver Book Fair to feature local writers

By DAVID J. LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Cherie Smith, who conceived the idea of a Jewish book fair for Vancouver 13 years ago, will officially launch her own book, Mendel's Children, this year.

The book, which has received glowing reviews from Saturday Night Magazine and the Western Jewish Bulletin, chronicles the colorful exploits of Smith's family, who immigrated to the Canadian prairies from the shtetls of Latvia and Poland in the 1890s.

"Cherie has been the life of the book fair and really deserves the praise she has received for Mendel's Children," said Tamar Frankel, the coordinator of this year's book fair,

In addition to Smith's book launch on Nov. 9, Frankel and her two co-chairs, Alina Wydra and Nava Soudack, have a full slate of activities lined up for the book fair, which takes place at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver from Nov. 8 to 11.

Highlights include an opening night open mike that will showcase the talents of Vancouver Jewish writers; a creative writing workshop led by award winning television writer and creative writing teacher Dale Adams Segal; and a lecture by filmmaker Bonnie Klein, who will speak about her book Slow Dance.

Activities for children and seniors are also planned. Children's performer Jeni Wright will entertain with puppets and songs, writer Joan Stuchner will read for both seniors and children, Neil Chaikel will lead a children's book illustration workshop and Internet trainer and writer Hilary Ostrov will provide Jewish teenagers with an introductory tour of the Jewish corners of the Web.

In addition, the book fair is sponsoring the second annual Young Jewish Writers Festival, which will feature readings of young authors from the Jewish community.

The book fair is sponsored by the JCC of Greater Vancouver and includes participation from the Isaac Waldman\ Jewish Public Library. Held in conjunction with International Jewish Book Week, it also offers a large selection of Jewish books and Judaica for sale, items brought to Vancouver especially for the fair.

Frankel says the book fair (a common event in her native Israel) helps to introduce a lot of Jewish literature to Vancouver that would not otherwise receive exposure.

"I've heard that people who have no other contact with the community come to the book fair," she adds.

Hamilton shul presidents to be honored

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The Jewish community here will pay tribute to three former synagogue presidents for their years of community service, at the 1997 State of Israel Bonds — B'nai Brith, Hamilton breakfast on Nov. 9, 9:30 a.m. at Temple Anshe Sholom.

Guest speaker, Judy Feld Carr will talk about the rescue of Syrian Jews.

Harold Goldblatt, a businessman, is a past president of Beth Jacob Congregation.

Howard Katz, a lawyer, is a past president of Adas Israel Synagogue, a former president of Beth Jacob Synagogue, a former Jewish Community Centre president, former chair of the annual Max Rotman Humanitarian Youth Award, and the current president of Hamilton ORT.

Jay State, also a lawyer, is involved in B'nai Brith and is the immediate past president of Temple Anshe Sholom.

Philip Leon, a former Bonds honoree himself, is the new Hamilton Bonds general chair. The breakfast will be chaired by David Walman.

Jewish Singles Registry - The Last Dating Service You Will Ever Need

When it comes to dating services, the Jewish Singles Registry has always been a leader in its field. With that in mind, the J.S.R. is excited to introduce a new pricing structure that over time, LOWERS the cost of a membership. The UNLIMITED MEMBERSHIP involves a one time low registration fee that allows you stay in the J.S.R. for FREE and/or as long as you wish, until you find the relationship you are looking for. "Our market research has shown that our UNLIMITED MEMBERSHIP package is the best deal out there," says an excited JSR Director and Founder Rob Singer. "It combines value, flexibility, ease of use, and with new members registering practically every day, finding someone special to go out with has never been easier." Singer reports that existing members have already begun upgrading their memberships to the new UNLIMITED MEMBERSHIP. "Response has been overwhelming" Singer notes. "We can honestly say that we offer the best value of any other dating service in the city."

The advantages to the UNLIMITED MEMBERSHIP are enormous. Because there are no limited or minimum number of dates, members can browse the profiles at their leisure, and select those members whom they feel are most compatible. Once a selection is made the Registry staff is fast at work, (usually that very same day), contacting the selected individuals and arranging for them to come in to the J.S.R. and see who wants to meet them. The system is fast, efficient, and fun, and currently averages an engagement every four weeks.

J.S.R.'s trip to Club Med - SOLD OUT

It didn't take long, but the J.S.R.'s Club Med trip is sold out. This fabulous all inclusive trip to Cancun, Mexico will take place January 11-18, 1998 and for $1398 it includes return flight, departure & transportation taxes, food and drinks (at tables), Club Med membership fee, all Club Med activities as written in their brochure, lodging (based on double occupancy), and gratuities. Those still wishing to go may be put on a waiting list, but call the J.S.R. office at 416-483-4151 as soon as possible.

Next Open House - Sun., Nov. 23

A few weeks ago the J.S.R. held an Open House as an introduction for those not familiar with the service. The afternoon was such a great success that another one is planned for Sunday, November 23, from 1-5 p.m. where visitors will be able to meet the entire JSR staff, as well as read selected profiles of actual members, see their photographs, and listen to recorded voice personal messages. The afternoon promises to be educational, informative and fun. Just think how a few hours of your time on a lazy afternoon could very easily put you on the right track to meeting exciting, eligible, and dynamic Toronto Jewish singles. Don't miss this one!

If you are looking to meet Jewish singles be it for friendship, a relationship, or marriage, the time is right to sign up with The Jewish Singles Registry. Richmond shul gets new Torah

By BAILA LAZARUS
Western Jewish Bulletin

RICHMOND, B.C. — When Eitz Chaim Synagogue celebrated the dedication of a new Torah here recently, some 100 people turned out for the event.

The Torah was donated by the Taubi family in memory of two of their young children who died in a house fire in Richmond seven years ago. Grandmother Yvette Taubi said she had wanted to donate a Torah in their memory ever since they died.

"It brings peace for their soul," she explained. "Every time they read the Torah, it elevates their soul."

Taubi said that when she travelled, she told friends around the world about her wish to buy a Torah to donate to the synagogue and she received donations from people in New York, Brazil and Switzerland.

Instead of buying a finished Torah, she commissioned one especially for the synagogue from Rabbi Eliezer Zurkin, a scribe in New York. The scribe came to Vancouver and concluded writing the Torah at the dedication. He also invited those in attendance to participate in writing the final letters.

The new scroll came just in time for Eitz Chaim, which already owns two Torahs. A synagogue needs at least three Torahs, according to Rabbi Abraham Feigelstock of Eitz Chaim.

"In many weeks, you have to take out two Torahs if it's a special occasion," he said, "for example, if it's Shabbat and Rosh Chodesh. So you read one Torah for the portion of the week and with the other one, you read the reading of Rosh Chodesh."

If there are three special events on the same day, such as a holiday, the beginning of the month and the start of the Sabbath, he said, a synagogue needs to use three Torahs simultaneously.

One Torah could be used, Rabbi Feigelstock said, but that would necessitate scrolling it back and forth.

Eitz Chaim has one Torah on loan from Schara Tzedeck Synagogue; so the new one brings its total to four. That was just what the synagogue needed, as they had two services running concurrently on the High Holy Days. As well, Yom Kippur this year began on a Friday night, coinciding with Shabbat.

The cost of a single Torah is between $25,000 and $35,000. They are usually made from the hide of a baby calf and written with special ink using a feather quill. The parchment, Rabbi Feigelstock said, has to be made specifically for the sake of the Torah and cannot be prefabricated. In this particular case, the scribe made the parchment himself.

Rabbi Feigelstock said donating a Torah to a synagogue is a great mitzvah.

"Actually, the last mitzvah in the Torah is to write a Torah," he said. "It's a very special mitzvah. That's why we invite everybody who is [at the dedication] to participate."

The new Torah will be read every week for the first year to ensure there are no mistakes. If one is found, depending on its severity, that section may be taken out and sent back to the scribe or it may be corrected locally by a trained person such as Rabbi Feigelstock, Rabbi Yossef Benarroch or Rabbi Achiya Delouya.

Govt. committed to deporting war criminals: Vickery

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Despite continued criticism over its commitment to strip suspected Nazi war criminals of their citizenship and deport them, the federal government is absolutely dedicated to pursuing the agenda, the director of the Justice Department's war crimes unit insisted here.

"Is the punishment adequate? It is not adequate, but it is the best we are capable of doing at this time," Paul Vickery said in his first public appearance before a Jewish audience at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue.

"This is not a Mickey Mouse remedy. It's a remedy that deserves our serious support."

Vickery spoke to an audience of 400 – including about 50 Holocaust survivors – as part of a panel discussion that included Arnold Fradkin, a former deputy director of the unit, and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) national director Jack Silverstone.

The event took place on the eve of the 10th anniversary of Bill C-71, legislation that made possible the prosecution of suspected Nazi war criminals in Canada.

Vickery said that as proof of its commitment, 12 cases of denaturalization are before the courts, with five of them slated to go to trial by next March.

This is part of a new "case management" approach that puts binding time parametres, usually no more than a year, in bringing cases to trial.

The unit is "pressing forward as quickly as possible," said Vickery, who prefaced his remarks by assuring the audience that Canada would not be a "safe haven" for war criminals.

He noted as well that the unit has been launching proceedings at a rate of four per year, compared to the rate of six per year by the U.S. Office of Special Investigations (OSI).

That's a pace that's "matching quite closely" the U.S. rate, he said, and one "quite remarkable" if you take into account the respective sizes of the two countries.

The unit is pursuing an "honest and dedicated effort," he said.

Later, Vickery found himself having to respond to several pointed questions while fielding queries from a select panel, which included CJAD talk show host Tommy Schnurmacher, and from the audience.

Panelist questioner Leah Kaufman, a Holocaust survivor, accused the Canadian government of "deception" in terms of its intentions, "then or now," of pursuing the war crimes agenda.

Vickery said he understood how she felt, given the "50 years of delay."

But, "within our ability, we are determined to make a difference.

"I can assure you that it is far from easy to assemble a case, but it is possible and we are pressing forward as quickly as we can."

Vickery, in reply to an audience question, said that the impact of American Nazi hunter Steve Rambam, who claimed to have proof of dozens of war criminals in Canada, has been subject to "media overstatement."

Nazi hunter

While Vickery said the media coverage "raised public awareness," the four suspects on six tapes he submitted to Canadian authorities were already under investigation and that the tapes contained no confessions or any evidence "anywhere near sufficient" to meet the standard required for denaturalization and deportation.

Vickery also asked the RCMP to request additional taped material from Rambam, but, "to date, Rambam has not delivered any further tapes," Vickery said.

In reply to other questions, Vickery also stated that he is not prepared to respond to accusations of historical "gross negligence" on the part of the Canadian government, but only its performance during his own tenure.

Similarly, Vickery said reports of an "anti-Jewish bias" within the unit before he came on board are being studied by a special inquiry due to issue its report shortly.

Earlier, Fradkin presented a detailed account of the Jacob Luitjens case, to date Canada only successful deportation case against a citizen or permanent resident, which he prosecuted. Luitjens was deported to the Netherlands in November 1992.

Fradkin, who had worked for the unit's first director, Bill Hobson, did not hesitate to say that historically, "by coincidence or design," Canada did not devote the "slightest amount of energy" to keep suspected war criminals off Canadian soil or to root them out once their was knowledge of their presence.

Yet, the Luitjens case, in his view a crucial test case, proved that, "if you proved Luitjens, you could prove other cases."

Silverstone said that the attitude of successive Canadian governments has been characterized by "four 'Ds': defiance, denial, dissembling and delay."

He cited a 1962 External Affairs memo that said prosecuting Nazi war criminals "would be tantamount to 'pandering to Jewish revenge.'"

"What an obscene comment!," Silverstone said.

Between 1990 and 1995, in meeting with senior Justice Department officials, "it became clear to me that those who had taken control of this dossier from Hobson, Fradkin [who by then had left the unit] and others had neither the inclination nor intestinal fortitude to pursue these and other cases aggressively."

At that point, CJC resolved not to attend any more meetings that did not include the federal justice minister.

Silverstone, who served as CJC's associate counsel before the Deschenes Commission, indicated that the situation has seemed to improve going the denaturalization and deportation route under former justice minister Allan Rock and current minister Anne McLellan, who with Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard are due to meet with a CJC officials at the end of the month.

AFTER THE BLAST

Six month old toddler Tamar Kaufman recuperates in Bikur Cholim hospital following the terrorist bombing in the Ben Yehuda Mall. The toddler, along with her parents, were among those injured in the blast.

Early detection program helps in fight against breast cancer

BEERSHEVA — A special community outreach program implemented by the Soroka Medical Centre in Israel reports a 150 percent increase in the early detection of breast cancer over the last five years. This in turn has led to a much improved cure rate among those diagnosed.

The statistics contrast sharply with the 20 percent early detection rate of breast cancer cases five years ago. At that time, Soroka conducted only 500 mammograms per month, compared to the present, where the number of mammography tests has risen to 1,000 per month. As a result of more women getting screened, half of all breast cancers currently diagnosed at Soroka have been discovered in the earliest stage.

"These are astounding and promising statistics for all women. Our far-reaching goal is to regularly screen the entire female population of the Negev, continuing our active community outreach program to encourage, and to educate women as to the importance and significance of early detection," said Dr. Michael Koretz, director of the Soroka Breast Health Centre.

The centre is the only facility of its kind in the entire southern region of Israel, serving 60 percent of the state's geographic area. However, while this dramatic increase is most promising, Soroka faces many additional challenges with regard to the disease.

The Negev is composed of people from many different ethnic and cultural backgrounds. Certain populations who have migrated to this vast part of Israel normally have a low incidence of breast cancer, yet within one generation, their rates equal those of breast cancer in Israeli-born women. Conversely, certain other immigrant groups, such as women from the former Soviet Union, have such advanced breast cancer that they actually travel directly to the Soroka emergency room as soon as their plane lands in Israel.

"We see women who arrive here with baseball-sized tumors, but because they come from a place where there is no accessible medical care, they go untreated until they can get to our facility," Koretz said. He attributes the high incidence of breast cancer, particularly in these Russian women, to a combination of genetics, poor diet and environmental factors such as the Chernobyl disaster.

The centre has recently acquired the first and only Advanced Breast Biopsy Instrument, (ABBI) in Israel. The ABBI is a computerized stereotactic biopsy instrument that can completely diagnose and remove small breast cancers with minimal discomfort under local anesthesia. Plans are under way for a Comprehensive Breast Health Centre to open in the year 2000, where emphasis will be placed on education, prevention, screening and early diagnosis.

Garlic's really good for you

REHOVOT — Garlic has been said to work wonders, from fighting disease to keeping away vampires. Now, two studies conducted at the Weizmann Institute of Science have uncovered a molecular mechanism which may be the basis for some of garlic's therapeutic effects.

The researchers studied how garlic works at the molecular level by producing large quantities of pure allicin, garlic's main biologically active component.

One study, appearing in the October issue of the American Society for Microbiology's Antimicrobial Agents and Chemotherapy, explains how allicin fights infection. This research supports the notion that garlic is an excellent, although smelly, natural antimicrobial drug that can disable an unusually wide variety of infectious organisms.

The second study, soon to be reported in Biochimica Biophysica Acta, may help clarify the role allicin plays in preventing heart disease and other disorders.

In the studies, the scientists revealed and characterized a molecular mechanism by which allicin blocks certain groups of enzymes.

Allicin, created when garlic cloves are crushed, protects the plant from soil parasites and fungi and is also responsible for garlic's pungent smell.

The studies were led by Profs. David Mirelman and Meir Wilchek of the Institute's biological chemistry department, who worked together with departmental colleagues Drs. Serge Ankri, Talia Miron and Aharon Rabinkov and with Prof. Lev Weiner and Dr. Leonid Konstantinovski of the organic chemistry department.

Bacteria's drug-resistance molecule discovered

REHOVOT — In a study that throws new light on the alarming phenomenon of increasing bacterial drug resistance, researchers at the Weizmann Institute of Science have discovered a molecule that enables bacteria to resist an unusually wide range of drugs.

The finding, to be reported in the April issue of the Journal of Bacteriology, suggests that it may become more and more difficult to design effective new medications for bacterial infections.

However, the newly identified molecule, named MdfA, may serve as a model for the further study and understanding of multidrug resistance, aiding efforts to overcome this phenomenon in bacterial diseases. This research may also help clarify multidrug resistance in human cancers, which results in tumor cells expelling anti-cancer drugs, thus presenting serious obstacles to chemotherapy.

"The more sophisticated the drugs we develop, the more bacteria may emerge equipped with sophisticated ways to fight these drugs," says Dr. Eitan Bibi of the institute's biochemistry department. Bibi conducted the study with doctoral student Rotem Edgar. "This is an obvious challenge for antibacterial therapies that must be planned in anticipation of growing resistance mechanisms."

Cells of virtually all living organisms are known to contain molecules that enable them to resist a variety of substances. These molecules sit inside cell membranes and act as pumps, ejecting toxic compounds or other unwanted chemicals from the cell. However, the "unwanted" substances may include medications.

Previously, most of these versatile molecular "pumps" were known to be capable of recognizing and resisting certain classes of drugs with particular chemical properties, such as those with a positive charge and a propensity to attach to lipids (molecules that make up cell membranes). These chemical properties determine how a drug will be absorbed by a cell, and influence the drug's toxic effects on a target site inside the cell.

The newly identified multidrug resistance molecule, MdfA, allows bacterial cells to expel one of the widest ranges known of unrelated antibiotics and other drugs with widely varying chemical properties. For example, it can resist both positively charged drugs and those with no charge at all, as well as drugs that attach to lipids and those that do not.

"Finding a molecule with such an extraordinarily broad spectrum of resistance in one species of bacteria means we are likely to find similar molecules in other bacteria," says Bibi.

"This highlights the dormant potential of some bacteria to survive even complex antibiotic treatments, and presents a challenge for future therapies."

Bibi and Edgar identified the MdfA molecule while researching multidrug resistance in Escherichia coli (E. coli), a species of bacteria commonly used in scientific research. (E. coli normally live in the human colon and aid digestion, but if certain strains of the bacteria enter other organs through contaminated drinking water or improper toilet hygiene, they can cause serious illnesses such as acute infant diarrhea and urinary tract infections.)

Spiritual revival, social action on Reform agenda

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

DALLAS — David Belin, a lifetime member of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) board of trustees, has been trying for many years to convince the Reform movement to sanction rabbinic officiation at interfaith marriages, but his colleagues are not interested.

The 4,500 Reform Jews attending the UAHC biennial, which ended Sunday, backed the movement's rabbinic arm by refusing to even consider Belin's resolution urging Reform rabbis to officiate at interfaith marriages.

On another controversial marriage issue, the Reform laity also followed the lead of the rabbinic arm in passing a resolution supporting civil marriage for gay and lesbian couples.

During the five-day conference, the dominant issues on the agenda related to spiritual revival and social action.

For the first time in years, matters related to intermarriage were not on the program, though they continue to be central in the life of Reform congregations.

The Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR), the Reform movement's rabbinic organization, discourages interfaith marriages, but leaves the decision to officiate up to each rabbi.

Nearly half of all Reform rabbis officiate at interfaith unions, according to a 1996 survey conducted by Rabbi Irwin Fishbein.

For most Reform rabbis, however, it is a serious and painful issue.

Belin, a Des Moines, Iowa, attorney, has been frustrated that the Reform movement discourages such officiation.

His resolution would have pressed the CCAR to rescind its longstanding opposition to its rabbis' officiating at interfaith marriages, which its members overwhelmingly upheld at their conference earlier this year.

But Belin's view was unpopular. Hundreds of people booed when the resolution was called up for debate and Belin was roundly hissed when he rose to defend his position.

"More than 75 percent of Reform Jews favor rabbinic officiation at intermarriages," said Belin, citing research conducted by the Jewish Outreach Institute.

But a majority of delegates voted not to allow Belin's resolution to be brought to a vote.

"It's not for us to decide. It's up to the rabbis," said Harold Bobroff, a delegate from Temple Sinai in Lawrence, N.Y., whose two children both married non-Jews.

The resolution supporting civil marriage for gay and lesbian couples also encouraged Reform congregations "to honor" monogamous domestic relationships formed by gay men or lesbians.

The CCAR has not yet weighed in with a position on religious "commitment ceremonies" for gay and lesbian couples, but does support civil marriage for them.

The issue of religious pluralism in Israel surfaced repeatedly during the convention, and a resolution was adopted calling on all American Jewish organizations to urge the Israeli government "to extend equal recognition and support to all streams of Judaism."

Among other resolutions adopted was one that would require a small fraction of the UAHC endowment – 1.8 percent – to be used for community development in impoverished areas.

A resolution was unanimously approved to launch a campaign to help fund congregations in the former Soviet Union affiliated with the Reform movement.

The biennial also approved a change in the schedule of dues most Reform congregations pay to the UAHC and the movement's seminary, the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion.

Dues obligations were reduced from 11 percent of a Reform temple's expenses to eight percent. Congregational representatives had been trying to lower that sum to seven percent.

Rabbi Sheldon Zimmerman, the head of the seminary, reacted angrily to the cuts.

"Remember next time you need an educator that you are cutting your contribution, and don't talk to me about cutting the budget" of the seminary, he said. "You can't have it both ways."

Group claims Australia haven for war criminals

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre believes that 64 suspected Latvian war criminals are living in Australia and has called on the Australian government to take action against them.

The centre's Israel director, Efraim Zuroff, gave the Australian ambassador to Israel the list of names and urged Australia to investigate the cases quickly.

Zuroff called on Australia to immediately begin proceedings against one suspect, Karlis Ozols, according to a statement released by the centre.

Zuroff charged that Ozols, now living in a suburb of Melbourne was an officer in the mobile-killing squad known as the Arajs Kommando, or Latvian Auxiliary Security Police, which collaborated with the Nazi SS during World War II.

About 75,000 Jews, or more than 90 percent of Latvia's pre-war Jewish community, were murdered by the Nazis — with help from local residents.

Zuroff called on Australia to deport war-crimes suspects for immigration violations in those cases where criminal prosecution under Australian law is "problematic" — an indirect criticism of Australia's record of inaction against alleged war criminals.

Of the more than 800 people investigated by the Australian government since 1989 for participation in Nazi war crimes, only three have faced charges.

None of the prosecutions have been successful, although Australian government officials estimate that at least 500 people who participated in crimes against humanity came to Australia after the war.

Zuroff also urged the Latvian authorities to cooperate with Australia in the investigation of alleged war criminals.

Latvian officials are meanwhile continuing their investigation of suspected Nazi war criminal Konrad Kalejs, 84, who is living in Australia.

Konrad Kalejs, 84, is alleged to have been a member of the Arajs Kommando and stands accused of having participated in the killing of 20,000 Jews in Latvia.

BUILDING MOMENTUM FOR THE FUTURE

The mandate of The Baycrest Centre Foundation is to generate the fiscal support necessary to carry on the mission of care, research and education of The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. In order to maintain eminence as a world premier institution in the provision of programs and services for the elderly, the fund raising challenges and opportunities have never been greater! Working with a newly appointed Foundation President, you will collaborate as part of the team that will build and implement a strategic process of change.

DIRECTOR, PLANNED GIVING

Planned Giving will assume renewed prominence in identifying charitable opportunities. By creating individual gift planning programs, you will effectively match the personal and philanthropic goals of donors, with the longer term vision of Baycrest.

Your background includes a progressive career in fund raising and capital projects. Your enthusiasm and creativity are complemented by the analytical skills and technical knowledge to ensure confidence when exploring the legal and financial implications of major gifts. You know where to go to find the innovative solutions that eliminate road-blocks to planned giving decisions. This will involve liaising with financial, legal and government institutions or working with Directors of Foundation and Centre Boards to solicit assistance.

The key to your success, however, must lie beyond an understanding of technical details. Possessing an intuitive sensitivity to the needs of the elderly and their families, and real insight to the Jewish community, you are able to build rapport and trust as a counselor. Your integrity is based on a relationship that offers credible options and on a genuine caring for your clients. File # LD183.

DIRECTOR, CORPORATIONS FOUNDATIONS & SPECIAL PROJECTS

Poised to launch a $10MM fall campaign backed by the prominence of high profile business leaders, this role will be focused on enhancing the profile of Baycrest within the business community.

Your strength lies in building strategies to capture and hold both the attention and commitment from sophisticated corporate interests. Creation of the plan and budget, development of an effective marketing medium, and cultivating a spirit of innovation within the team and lay committees are among your credentials. Ideally you have become familiar with the path to accessing foundation grants and understanding how to match policies with the mandate of the organization. Your background in fund raising has prepared you well for the task - identify potential partners, create compelling proposals and securing donations.

If you possess natural poise and confidence when thrust into new situations, if you are persuasive when presenting to large or small groups, if you relish the challenge of multiple projects, and blossom when organizing donors, volunteers and staff to achieve consensus - we invite your interest. File # LD184.

CJN Chanukah Poetry Contest

The CJN announces its third annual Chanukah poetry contest.

Who can enter: Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their family.

There are three age categories for entrants: 1. Twelve years old and under; 2. Thirteen to 18 years old; 3. Eighteen years old and up.

How to enter: The poems must be about Chanukah; they cannot be longer than 40 lines. A maximum of one poem per entrant may be submitted. Please include your name, age, address and phone number with the poem.

We would prefer to receive typewritten poems if possible.

We will return poems if you send a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your poems to:
CJN Chanukah Poetry Contest, The Canadian Jewish News,
1500 Don Mills Road., Suite 205, North York, Ontario, M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Dec. 8, 1997.

Prizes: The judges will choose six poems to be published, two from each of the three categories, which in their opinion, most poetically and evocatively convey an aspect of the meaning of Chanukah. Each of the "winners" will also receive a cheque for $50.

Only six poems will be selected as "winners". Space permitting, we may publish other poems as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of "winning" depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: "Winning" entrants will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, Dec. 12, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning poems will be published in The CJN of Dec. 25, 1997. We look forward to receiving your poems. May the miracle of Chanukah and the magic of its light be reflected in your poems.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

Tel Aviv mayor urges refineries move after blast kills worker

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV — Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo demanded last Sunday that the oil and gas refineries at the Glilot junction be moved immediately, in order to remove the threat to residents of the Tel Aviv metropolitan area.

Milo made the demand in a message to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon following Sunday morning's oil-storage tank explosion at the Ashdod refinery, in which a refinery worker was killed and two firefighters were injured.

Sinaya Barak, 45, had climbed up the side of the 18,000-litre tank to its roof to take samples for laboratory tests, when the blast occurred.

The force of the blast blew the roof off the storage tank and threw Barak off the tank into the yard, his body engulfed in flames. The intense heat generated from the burning tank prevented rescue workers from retrieving Barak's body until several hours later.

A medic at the scene said the two firefighters sustained leg injuries, one a probable sprain and the other a suspected fracture.

Fire Service officials ruled out sabotage and ordered an inquiry into the cause of the fire. Plant manager Rami Raphael said the plant would also carry out an investigation.

Committee investigating facility safety

Interior Minister Eliahu Suissa said his ministry and the National Infrastructure Ministry had appointed a committee to investigate whether the nation's oil refineries are following safety regulations. Suissa said the committee would also investigate yesterday's explosion. The committee is to present its findings at the end of the month.

Raphael told Israel Radio that he was unable to estimate the damage caused by the fire but that a new storage tank to replace the burned one would cost millions of dollars. He stressed that the water pool built around the tank to prevent any spills from igniting had performed as expected and had helped stop the fire from spreading.

The explosion shook the plant shortly before 8 a.m. Within seconds, flames shot 50 metres into the air from the storage tank. A dense black cloud billowed over the plant, situated at the port north of Ashdod.

Oil tanker drivers refuelling their trucks at the plant thought at first the blast and the tremors that followed were an earthquake.

"We heard a loud explosion. The earth shook under our feet," driver Morris Cohen, 40, told reporters at the scene. "The force of the blast threw us off our feet."

Seconds after the explosion, the plant's automatic emergency warning system alerted the plant's firefighters. Some 30 fire trucks and over 100 firefighters from stations in the Dan and Lachish regions, Ben-Gurion Airport and other parts of the country arrived at the site.

Magen David Adom sent ambulances to the plant and over 100 police vehicles closed off the highways and roads surrounding the refinery and rerouted traffic.

IDF helicopters were placed on alert in case they were needed to help quell the blaze and police helicopters directed firefighters from the air.

Plant workers immediately evacuated the site when the explosion occurred. Pupils and teachers from a nearby school were evacuated, as well as soldiers from nearby army bases. The black clouds of smoke could be seen from the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway.

Some three hours later, firefighters had the blaze under control.

Fire Service spokesperson Mondi Yitzhaki said the efforts focused on isolating the burning tank and cooling down the surrounding tanks by spraying them with water and foam to prevent them from catching fire.

Additional truckloads of foam were brought to the plant to ensure an adequate supply.

Fire and Rescue Commissioner Uri Manos told reporters that the firefighters had succeeded in preventing the fire from spreading to the other tanks and had thus prevented an even bigger disaster.

Swiss release names of 14,000 dormant accounts

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Swiss banks have released the names of those who held an additional 14,000 dormant accounts opened before the end of World War II.

Because of the large number of names and as a result of complaints from account holders that their privacy had been invaded when the banks published a list in July of some 1,800 dormant accounts, none of the names of the account holders will be published in newspapers.

Of the 14,000 accounts, about 3,700 belonged to non-Swiss citizens, but the banks provided no assurances that they belonged to Holocaust survivors. These names were posted on the Internet.

Those interested in accessing this list of accounts and obtaining an information kit can do so via the Internet at [www.dormantaccounts.ch].

Anyone with questions can call 800-662-7708.

The remaining 10,000-plus accounts belonged to Swiss citizens, some of whom may have opened the accounts on behalf of Holocaust victims.

The bankers' association said this list includes only those accounts containing $70 or more.

Information regarding accounts with Swiss names may be obtained directly from the Swiss banks or their overseas representatives.

The 3,700 accounts opened by non-Swiss citizens, worth a total of $4.1 million (US), are more than twice the number of accounts published by the Swiss Bankers Association in July.

The average amount in the latest accounts is about $1,100. The Swiss banks said they would add accrued interest according to a formula to be devised by American economist Henry Kaufman.

By comparison, the July list of some 1,800 dormant accounts opened by non-Swiss citizens, published in major newspapers around the world and on the Internet, involved accounts estimated at the time to have a value of some $42 million.

The accounts opened by Swiss citizens are valued at about $8.3 million, bringing the total amount involved in all the accounts announced so far to about $54.4 million.

The Swiss banks last year began their investigation of dormant accounts from World War II after being criticized by Jewish leaders for serving as the Nazis' bankers and for refusing to turn over accounts opened by Jews fleeing the Holocaust.

As their investigation proceeds, more accounts are being turned up by the Swiss banks, as their own recent disclosures have shown.

In testimony last fall before a U.S. congressional panel, Swiss Bankers Association representatives said they could only locate 775 accounts worth about $32 million.

Jewish groups have charged that Swiss banks are holding up to $7 billion in assets deposited by Jews during the World War II era.

Tudjman visit opposed

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Two Israeli lawmakers are trying to block a planned visit by Croatian President Franjo Tudjman, saying he is an anti-Semite who has aligned himself with Holocaust deniers.

Yossi Beilin of the Labor party and Yossi Sarid of the Meretz party have submitted urgent motions in the Knesset to cancel the trip.

Tudjman informed the Foreign Ministry that he intended to visit Israel next month, Israel Radio reported Sunday. The report said Tudjman had expressed an interest in apologizing for the actions of his people during World War II and in visiting the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial.

Beilin and Sarid responded to the report by submitting the Knesset motions.

Beilin said in a statement that the Croatian president's plans to apologize for the crimes of his people did not exonerate him from calling the Holocaust a "Jewish invention."

Syria courting Iraq as Arafat woos Iran

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

In what could be a major political development, two regional rivals, Syria and Iraq, have begun to normalize relations.

And as this unfolds, the Palestine Authority (PA) has taken steps to improve ties with Iran, which enjoys an excellent relationship with Syria but which is barely on speaking terms with Iraq.

Mideast Analysis

All signs suggest that Syria is moving toward a rapprochement with Iraq, which has been consigned to isolation since its invasion of Kuwait. In the past few months, Syria has reopened two border crossings on the Iraqi frontier which had been closed since 1982; signed a modest trade agreement with Baghdad; allowed a delegation of Iraqi journalists to visit Damascus for the first time in 17 years; and sent its first donation of humanitarian aid to Iraq since the imposition of United Nations economic sanctions in 1990.

Israel, which remains in a state of war with both Syria and Iraq, is monitoring these developments warily, wondering whether a new and formidable Arab alliance is taking shape before its eyes.

In all likelihood, Syria and Iraq, whose differences run deep, are not in fact forming an alliance, but merely trying to restore normal diplomatic relations, which were suspended in the early 1980s.

Their mutual enmity goes back at least three decades. Syria and Iraq are ruled by rival wings of the Ba'ath party, whose philosophical underpinnings are Arab unity, socialism and freedom. Their autocratic leaders, Hafez Assad and Saddam Hussein, are deeply suspicious of each other.

These divisions were greatly exacerbated by Syria's support of Tehran in the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq War and by Syria's decision to join the anti-Iraqi alliance during the 1991 Gulf War.

Why then, is Syria moving to reestablish formal relations with Iraq?

Israel's budding military alliance with Turkey is pushing Syria closer to Iraq. Though Turkey has repeatedly declared that its growing entente with Israel is not aimed at any neighbor, Syria considers it a strategic threat. Indeed, Syria's vice president, Abdel Halim Khaddam, recently described it as "a vise with Syria squeezed at two ends."

With Turkey's Islamist prime minister, Necmettin Erbakan, having been forced to resign by the army last June, Syria feels even more hemmed in by Israel's military ties with Turkey. Erbakan sought to undermine Israeli influence in Ankara, and now that he is gone, Syria is even more paranoiac about Israel's relations with Turkey.

Syria's interest in courting Iraq also stems from its discontent with the Arab-Israeli peace process, as Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Amnon Shahak, has suggested. With the Syrian track in a rut, Assad could be using the prospect of an accommodation with Iraq as a means by which to pressure Israel.

Apart from these factors, Syria has clear economic and security reasons for wishing to cozy up to Iraq.

- Syria regards Iraq as a natural outlet for its exports.
- Damascus and Baghdad want to reopen an oil pipeline which passes through Syrian territory to the Mediterranean Sea.
- Syria and Iraq fear that Turkey's construction of hydroelectric projects on the Euphrates and Tigris rivers may partially block their access to its waters.

In tandem with these developments, Yasser Arafat, president of the PA, has tried to heal the rift between the PLO and Iran. Iranian-PLO relations were strained by the Oslo accords and by Arafat's accusation that Iran orchestrated the 1996 wave of suicide bombings in Israel.

Last March, at an Islamic conference in Pakistan, Arafat met with Iran's outgoing president, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani. And in June, after Iran's new president, Mohammed Khatami, was elected, Arafat dispatched a personal envoy to Tehran.

Presumably, Arafat is wooing Iran — a vocal opponent of the peace process — because he requires allies to offset his tense relations with Israel.

The Week in Israel

Oct. 27

- Russian Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov said during a two-day visit to Israel he believed Israeli navigator Ron Arad, shot down over Lebanon in 1986, is dead. (Later in the week, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu disputed the statement. Israeli intelligence believes Arad is alive.)

- An inquiry into the failed naval commando raid in Lebanon last month concluded that the 12 fighters killed in the operation were struck by two explosives planted by Hezbollah. The commission ruled out malfunction of equipment or an intelligence leak.

Oct. 28

- Israel released another 22 Palestinian prisoners as part of the deal reached after the failed intelligence operation in Amman.

Oct. 29

- Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron called on the National Religious Party to form an alternative to the Jewish Agency, according to a report in Ha'aretz. Bakshi-Doron said the move was necessary because agency chair, Avraham Burg, supports the positions of the Reform and Conservative movements in Israel in the debate on conversion and religious councils.

- In response to President Bill Clinton's campaign to ban assault weapons in the United States, Israel announced it will not sell Uzi or Galil rifles for a period of three months in the U.S.

Oct. 30

- Reports that Foreign Minister David Levy would offer a nine-month settlement freeze in return for a postponement of the IDF's next pullback in the West Bank were dismissed by his aides as they prepared for his talks in Washington with the Palestinian Authority's Mahmoud Abbas.

Oct. 31

- Two senior Palestinian officials were arrested as they attempted to enter the Gaza Strip in vehicles recently stolen from Jerusalem.
- The Prime Minister's Office confirmed that he plans to address the Council of Jewish Federations on Nov. 16 in Indianapolis.

Israel & the Jewish World

Israel must put the world Jewish family first

roughout the world, with the State f Israel — the shared home of all ews — serving an essential role in iving structure and coherence to his family-governed experience of ewish identity.

The centrality of family in defin- ng Jewish consciousness is not, I elieve, antithetical to classical otions of Jewish identity. On the ontrary, Maimonides rules in the Mishneh Torah: One who separates himself from the community, even f he does not commit a transgres- ion but only holds aloof from the congregation of Israel, does not ulfil religious precepts in common with his people; shows himself in- different when they are in distress; does not observe their fast, but goes his own way, as if he were one of he gentiles and did not belong to he Jewish people — such a person has no portion in the world to come. (Laws of Repentance, 3:20) Indif- erence to the family of Jews is tan- amount to indifference to their covenantal destiny.

Today, perhaps more than in any other period of history, Jews are openly showing a deep concern and an unprecedented ability to act ef- fectively as a community on behalf of endangered Jews wherever they may be. If one compares North American Jewry's passivity during the Holocaust with its activism for Soviet Jewry in the 1960s, one is struck by the transformation of Jews from a reticent, self-conscious com- munity into a vigorous, bold, na- tional body articulating its legiti- mate survival needs and interests in the public arena of world cultures and nations.

There is no doubt that one of the primary causes of this transforma- tion was the return of the Jewish people to its ancient homeland; the re-establishment of the State of Israel gave Jews a new sense of public dignity and recognition, a new voice in which to express their collective concerns and aspirations.

The Law of Return gave formal legal expression to the then-evident idea that Israel was — and always will be — the home of all Jews. What this law said, in effect, was that Israel is not only the home of those who cast votes in its elections or serve in its army, but that Israel is also home to the whole of the Jewish world. Everyone who par- ticipates in the destiny of the Jewish people has a right to become a citizen of the State of Israel.

If one appreciates the importance of the idea of family for contempo- rary Jewish consciousness and how deeply Israel has penetrated and sustains this sense of family by pro- viding a common historical home for the entire Jewish people, then one cannot but realize the tragic mistake of trying to pass the cur- rently debated conversion bill in the Knesset.

One cannot, on the one hand, issue a bold invitation to all Jews to view Israel as their home and, on the other hand, allow the Knesset, the main legislative body of Israel, to rule that the Jewish way of life of the majority of world Jewry is fraudulent, inauthentic, and offi- cially devoid of legitimacy as a me- diating framework of Jewish life and values.

The defensive argument that the conversion bill would apply only in Israel is as cynical as it is irrelevant to the offensive issue at the heart of the legislation. How can the phi- losophy of Conservative and Re- form Judaism be treif in Israel but kosher in the Diaspora? Is their content different?

It is ironic that the theology and practice of Conservative and Re- form Jews in Israel is probably more in keeping with traditional Judaism than in America. This irony only reveals the cynicism of those willing to give a hechsher because of their fear of interrupting the cash flow from the Diaspora or of the negative political and economic repercussions of proclaiming the il- legitimacy of Conservative and Reform synagogues and rabbis in North America and Europe.

How crass and transparently po- litical is this argument aimed at the opponents of this seemingly serious theological and religious issue! What an "honorable" message the Knesset thus issues to the world at large! It is important to place my objection to religious legislation in perspective by considering the dis- tinction between pluralism and rel- ativism.

The pluralism I am advocating aims at guaranteeing the rights of all religious groups to express their understanding and appreciation of Judaism within Israel, without the state deciding in favor of any one party to the religious discussion. I am not asking Orthodox rabbis to give up their convictions or under- standing of the meaning of Torah and Halachah. They are entitled to teach whatever they believe and to argue vigorously against Reform and Conservative rabbis and their theologies. This is a legitimate dis- agreement that should be aired and discussed throughout the Jewish world.

Open disagreements about the nature of halachic practice and re- ligious belief, however vehement, will not threaten the future of the Jewish people so long as the leg- islative authority of the State of Israel remains outside of the debate. If the Knesset were to legislate the sole legitimacy of the Orthodox un- derstanding of Torah into law, then the family-based sense of Jewish identity would be called into ques- tion. Without a vital sense of family, we will never be able to build a moral and spiritual understanding of Torah needed for our generation. Family and collectivity precede the commitment of faith. The book of Genesis and the early chapters of Exodus tell the story of a family, a people, who share a common destiny. Only in the 19th chapter of Exodus does God call upon Moses to bring this people to Sinai to enter a covenant based upon Torah and mitzvot.

Today, although we have expe- rienced a shared Egypt, a shared vulnerability, and a shared suffer- ing, we do not share a common Sinai. We are divided by competing and differing understandings of what Sinai entails, of what Torah and mitzvot should mean for modern Jewry. We do, however, share a common memory of suffer- ing and a sense of family that binds us together as one people.

The Knesset must appreciate the important role of sustaining Jewish identity throughout the world. Having lost Torah as the organizing factor of Jewish consciousness, we must nurture the remaining element of family awareness that informs Jewish identity today. How dare we weaken this fragile but indispens- able feature of Jewish continuity!

I understand the pressures on Prime Minister Benjamin Ne- tanyahu and others to make coali- tion agreements and to stay in power, if only for the sake of pro- viding "peace with security" for the Jewish people in Israel. I also believe, however, that Jews both in Israel and throughout the world require for their security the belief in the Israeli government's ability to transcend self-interested coali- tion politics for the sake of a more profound conviction and commit- ment to the continued well-being of the Jewish family.

Without such a belief, Jews will become alienated from their gov- ernment and Israel will lose the credibility and vitality necessary for making this society the spiritual home for all Jews.

New kids' recording

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A new children's recording by the Toronto-based band Kiddush Club, led by vocalist/songwriter Gedalia Zweig, combines original Jewish holiday songs with tunes that relate to youngsters' everyday life.

The song Chanuka and the title song Toys, with the latter's reference to a dreidel, are particularly timely. Other holiday tunes are Purim Story and 10 Plagues. All songs are written by Zweig.

Exercise, an energetic rock-type song, might help preschoolers pick up the exercise habit, and the bouncy title song is also likely to get them moving.

Among the nine selections is Baby in White, a sweet ballad about parents' gratitude for their new child.

"We care about children...especially yours"

"I still believe that people are good at heart"

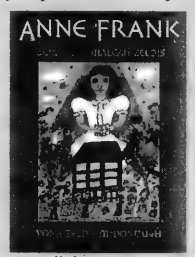
By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Imagine being thirteen years old. You love school, and get lead parts in school plays. You like to spend time at the beach with your parents and your sister, and read about movie stars. Most of all, you like to write.

Then you are forced to move with your family and a lot of other people to a tiny set of rooms in a secret annex, because that is the only way to avoid being captured and for all anyone knows, killed.

That is what happened to Anne Frank. Like many children in Europe during World War II, she and her family tried to hide from the Nazis, whose main goal while they were trying to conquer the world, was to wipe out all the Jews.

But Anne Frank had one weapon that was stronger than all the Nazi guns — she could write. Her diary is one of the best known and loved books ever published on the Holocaust, and her wistful statement that "Despite everything, I still believe that people are really good at heart," still moves everyone who reads it.



Yona Zeldis McDonough was fascinated by Anne's story, and wrote a book for children called simply, Anne Frank (Henry Holt & Co., 1997), illustrated by Malcah Zeldis. It is a beautiful account of what life was like for Anne, most of it taken from her diary.

You learn how she coped with the cramped quarters, with her parents (even in hiding, she had the normal teenage disagreements with them!) and her special friendship with Peter, another teenager in hiding with her.

Even when things were worst, she wrote stories, and dreamed of being a writer. And she dreamed of growing up, going to parties and falling in love.

Her dreams never came to pass. Someone told the Nazis where they were and everyone in the annex was sent to a concentration camp. They all died except Anne's father Otto, who published her diary after the war.

This month includes Holocaust Remembrance Week, when there are many special programs about those terrible years. The book is a way for children to begin to learn what it was like during that time.

It also shows how in spite of the worst kind of troubles, goodness and talent can still shine through.

Humpback whales entertain visitors to Sandyneck Harbor

13-metre mammals turn on their sides, dive and even do somersaults

By JOSIE NEWMAN PROVOST
Special to The CJN

Our boat had pulled out of Sandyneck Harbor near Ryannie, Mass., at 12:30 p.m.

It was now 2:30 p.m and we'd had a fine cruise past Sandyneck Lighthouse and north into Cape Cod Bay. We learned that the light had been removed in 1952 because several boats had run onto shore rather than being guided into the harbor. We motored past pleasure craft and fishing sloops, whose sailors waved at us as we headed further out to sea.

Brian, our naturalist guide aboard the Hyannis Whale Watcher cruise, pointed out several seabirds, such as laughing gulls, herring gulls and sooty shearwaters, as the 200 passengers waited to reach the big attraction – the whales.

Finally we reached them – not just one or two, but a flotilla of whales. We saw the big ones, humpbacks and fins; but there are also plenty of minke and right whales in this area of the Atlantic Ocean.

Our premiere "show" was put on by two humpbacks, who teased us by appearing first on the right-hand side of the boat and then on the left. Wales surface five to 10 percent of the time for air. They swam, turned on their sides and dove into the depths, showing off their black and white tails and leaving a "footprint" or large circle in the water. Humpbacks also do somersaults.

These huge whales weigh approximately 30,000 kilos, are close to 13 metres long and eat half a tonne of small fish a day. They often catch their prey by swimming under a school of fish and blowing huge bubbles around them to confuse and capture them.

As we slowly journeyed further into the waters of Cape Cod Bay, we saw another group of humpbacks, a trio, who circled the boat and "posed" for pictures. Humpbacks travel very slowly, seven to 27 kilometres per hour, which is one reason why people see them so often. It's also why they were almost extinct in the 1960s until the International Whaling Commission began protecting them. They travel in groups of two to nine in breeding season, but as many as 150 will swim together while feeding.

In an hour and a half, we saw 10 whales – two were fin whales and the rest humpbacks. The boat listed from one side to the other as our 200 whale watchers raced back and forth across the boat to catch a glimpse of the huge marine mammals.

Humpbacks are a highly advanced mammal, as is evidenced by their ability to sing the most complicated songs of any species in the animal kingdom. Their songs last from six to 35 minutes, and even have different dialects in different geographical regions. Our group wasn't fortunate enough to hear one of these songs.

Fin wales weigh up to 70,000 kg and can be as long as 20 metres. There are approximately 50,000 finbacks in the world today and slightly fewer humpbacks. Unlike their humpback cousins, they travel very quickly, up to 37 km per hour, which is one reason we didn't see as many fins. At one time, they, too, were almost extinct, until the International Whaling Commission stepped in during the 1970s.

Although whales are migratory, "Cape Cod" whales inhabit a 100-square-mile area around Cape Cod. It includes Stalwagon Bank (an underwater glacial deposit that serves as a feeding area for whales in spring, summer and fall), Cape Cod Bay, and Massachusetts Bay.

There are many whale-watching cruise companies in the Boston and Cape Cod area. Hyannis, located on the north shore of Cape Cod near Barnstable, makes three whale-watching trips per day between April and October. For prices and more information, call 508-362-6088 or 1-800-287-0374, or write P.O. Box 254, Barnstable Harbor, Barnstable, Cape Cod, Mass. 02630, U.S.A.

Director thrilled to present 37 of Shkspr's works

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — There are those who would argue that only someone as mad as King Lear would direct a play that requires a trio of actors to perform all 37 of Shakespeare's works in just 97 minutes.

But this is not so according to award-winning actor/director/choreographer and playwright Joel Greenberg.

Instead, he considered the chance to direct The Compleat Works Of Wllm Shkspr (Abridged) to be outrageous fortune.

"It would be neat to have the opportunity to actually work on Shakespeare, but with this show, at least I've had the opportunity of doing all 37 plays. So I'm luckier than most people," Greenberg says.

Presented by the Wllm Shkspr (Abridged) Partners at the Bathurst Street Theatre for an extended run, the play is an all-Canadian production of a popular comedy first performed in 1987 by creators Jeff Borgeson, Adam Long and Daniel Singer.

The Toronto version of The Compleat Works Of Wllm Shkspr (Abridged) features actors Jonathan Goad, David Young and Frank Zotter, who perform more than 100 Shakespearean roles during the production. It's an exhausting theatrical feat that might explain why the play's talented actors were fitted with athletic kneepads and brightly colored sneakers, rather than jodhpurs and white frilly blouses.

"We spent a lot of time in rehearsal, really carefully working out the speed at which the different scenes had to go so that there was a dynamic and it wasn't just fast ...and that requires tremendous precision on the actors' parts," says Greenberg.

Yet despite its evenly distributed frenetic energy, this is more than simply a play for students whose previous studies of Shakespeare made them fidgety.

Instead, the play caters to children and adults alike by enlivening Shakespeare's dense texts with slapstick antics such as pratfalls and spit takes, as well as cleverly placed pop cultural references. While the play Titus Andronicus is presented as a cooking show with gory B-movie props, the story of Othello is told in a hilarious rap song punctuated by the flashing of strobe lights.

Hamlet performed backwards

And whereas Richard II takes shape as a thrilling sports event with play-by-plays provided by an obnoxious announcer, the chronology of the play Hamlet is performed backwards in a speedy one-minute finale.

"I'm very comfortable with the eclectic, throwing stuff together, improvising... and I love working with actors who enjoy that kind of playing around," says Greenberg.

However, it would be a tragedy of Shakespearean proportions for audiences to assume that the play's comedic treatment of such literary masterpieces is without an abundance of reverence.

"The success the show has had almost everywhere it's played really attests to the fact that you can only do this kind of comedy if, at the heart of it, it's done out of the love for the material. Otherwise it's reduced to a Saturday Night Live five-minute sketch," says Greenberg.

Similarly, it was Greenberg's love of theatre that convinced him to take on the important role of director after the play's original director had to withdraw as a result of an illness in his acting company.

"I came in about 10 days before the play went into rehearsal," says Greenberg.

Fortunately, the award-winning director had over 25 years of professional experience to draw upon. A Montreal native, Greenberg's career encompasses more than 75 productions across the country, multiple Dora Mavor Moore nominations, two Dora Awards and a Chalmers Playwrighting Award.

In February 1998, he will be returning to Montreal to direct Taking Sides, a play about a German conductor who chooses to stay in his native country during World War II and as a result, is accused of being a Nazi sympathizer.

Although the play promises to be as challenging as The Compleat Works Of Wllm Shkspr (Abridged), Greenberg says, "In Taking Sides, they will not wear Converse sneakers and they will not run in and out of doors."

The play runs until Jan. 31 at the theatre, 736 Bathurst St. Tickets are $20 to $39.50. For more information, call 872-1111.

Play director overcomes deafness

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bill Tepper, director of Holy Blossom Stagecraft Company's The Tenth Man, is deaf, but his actors say he overcomes his hearing impairment so well he brings out the best in them.

Tepper, a high school teacher in Peel for the past nine years, has been giving courses in drama and English to students. The Tenth Man, the fourth play he has directed for the company, is to be presented at the Temple Nov. 20, 22 and 23.

"The play, by Paddy Chayefsky, explores different aspects of Jewish life and brings the audience closer to the varying nature of its spirituality," said Tepper. "It prompts a re-examination of Jewish rituals and faith. In no way does the play dismiss them."

The director, who along with his wife and son, is an active member of Holy Blossom Temple, has also done Golda, A Body of Water, Crossing Delancey and Shmulnik's Waltz for the Stagecraft Company.

"In The Tenth Man we have converted several customary male roles to female ones in order to serve our group's needs and to give the production a contemporary perspective," he said.

Advance tickets for The Tenth Man are $10 ($12 at the door) while seniors and students pay half-price at the Thursday and Sunday shows. All performances begin at 7.30 p.m. For reservations call 789-3291, ext. 511.

Tel Aviv follows Wall Street

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — As goes Wall Street, so goes Tel Aviv.

This was the operative phrase for market action on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange for two successive days last week.

Share prices on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange dropped sharply last Tuesday in a shakeup touched off by the previous day's stock plunge on Wall Street.

The Tel Aviv exchange's two main indexes closed the day down by just under nine percent.

Earlier in the day, trading was automatically suspended after the blue-chip Maof Index fell by more than eight percent. Business resumed 45 minutes later.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman urged the public not to panic, assuring them that the Israeli economy is strong.

Some stock analysts said the slide was a temporary reaction to the record drop on Wall Street, where the Dow Jones Industrial Average dropped by more than 550 points last Monday, its steepest one-day point decline.

Business Profile

KBC Tools head makes customers feel at home

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — KBC Tools president Paula Bass has a master's degree in business administration from the University of Illinois and five years' experience running an arts organization in the United States, but her management philosophy at KBC can also be attributed to more mundane sources.

"I think everything you learn, you learn in your mother's home," said Bass, 34, in her Mississauga office, which is head office for Canada. "You should be greeted, and offered something to drink and eat. When you come here, I want you to feel that same welcome."

Hence the coffee – albeit not fresh-brewed – and candies or cookies when you enter KBC. Things don't have to be fancy, but they should be clean and neat, she believes.

Too many businesses in her industry have gruff employees and an uninviting back-door entrance, she noted in a recent interview. "That's not what I want my clients to [experience]," she said.

Bass has spent the past seven years working for the company her father Karel started in 1965. Now 81 and based in Detroit where Bass was raised, her father, a native of Czechoslovakia who lived in Israel and served in its army before settling in the United States, is KBC's chairman of the board.

Bass joined the company as general manager of the Mississauga branch and vice-president of marketing for the entire company, which has nine locations in Canada and the United States. In 1993, she became company president.

Canadian locations include Oldcastle, Ont. and Delta, B.C. KBC's newest outlet opened last year in Richmond Hill, Ont., and a machinery division, also located in Mississauga, is scheduled to open early in 1998. Although the head office for the company is in Sterling Heights, Mich., Bass spends most of her time here, often trying out new ideas that are then used at other locations.

The Mississauga location – now 20,000 square feet, of which 4,000 are devoted to retail space – opened only in 1989, and Bass' staff has grown from 12 (about one-third of whom were women) to over 30 people in the past seven years. Since 1990, business has increased tenfold, she said.

KBC stocks over $6 million in inventory – about 70,000 items – ranging from a 29-cent piece of sandpaper to the company's largest item, a $275,000 grinder. About one-quarter of the business is wholesale.

KBC's clientele includes local small- to medium-sized machine shops, the aerospace industry, large companies, individual hobbyists and customers in Japan, Switzerland and Mexico.

Their inventory, which includes some Israeli-made items, has increased steadily. In the past year alone, their master catalogue went from 665 to 797 pages. With two salespeople on the road, the master catalogue – printed in the "tens and tens of thousands" – is a source of much of KBC's business. (There are also special machinery catalogues.)

"We're in the business of selling products at really good prices and getting them to people quickly," said Bass.

"There are other places my clients can go," she admitted, "but not necessarily at the same price and with the same delivery."

To speed things up on one occasion, an employee broke up a set of stamps rather than make a customer wait for a single item to come in. "It was a good solution, but it messed up our inventory," recalled Bass. The result was a change to KBC's computer system to track inventory items individually.

An estimated 95 percent of tool businesses are family-run, said Bass, but there was no expectation that she would go that route. Before entering the MBA program, Bass completed a bachelor of fine arts degree at the University of Michigan, studying printmaking and painting. Several of her works grace the walls of KBC.

Shortly after she joined the company, Bass tended to react with ill-concealed annoyance when people asked if she was Karel Bass' daughter. "Because the question sounded like a typical one to ask a young woman in a traditionally male-dominated industry, I felt as if my abilities were being questioned," she wrote following the first Industrial Distribution Association convention she attended.

"Imagine my surprise and pleasure when I met hundreds of men and women at the convention who, like me, were second, third, fourth and even fifth generations working in a family business. Instead of [a] put-down, the question was a compliment, reflecting the pride that family businesses share."

She spends about one-third of her time on the road, visiting trade shows and other KBC locations.

Bass hasn't found it a disadvantage to be a woman in a male-dominated industry, although she admitted some clients prefer to deal with men.

She accepts that. "If a man calls and doesn't want to speak to me because I'm a woman, let him speak to someone else. I don't care where you buy, as long as you buy from KBC."

To educate herself, she took a machine shop class. "The school I went to ended up becoming a client of ours," she said.

Changes instituted by Bass included streamlining of operations to avoid redundancies, and fostering helpfulness and a greater work ethic among staff. "They didn't have that I'll-take-care-of-that attitude. There was no team feeling."

To counter that, Bass worked alongside them (and still does on occasion) and used incentives and recognition for jobs well done. A company newsletter was instituted. "I try to make people feel like they matter," she said.

On winter days when weather conditions make driving hazardous, Bass books rooms for employees at a local hotel. Those driving home are expected to call and let her know they've arrived safely. "And they do," she said.

The door to Bass' office is usually open. "Anybody can come in and say anything to me, and they do." There is also a suggestion box, and a number of changes have resulted from employee ideas.

Bass believes the recession "saved" KBC by allowing them time to "work out some of the kinks." By the time her staff reached 15 people, the atmosphere had changed so much they "did three times as much as the original twelve," she said.

Incorporating fun into the workplace is also important to Bass. Schmutzie, her schnauzer, is a fixture at KBC.

Company picnics and occasionally creative decor aside (the Mississauga showroom has been decorated as a 1950s-style diner and also in a golf tournament theme with the coffeepot as the 18th hole), the most "fun" business aspect of KBC is its small Tool-a-Rama boutique within the retail outlet.

Tool-a-Rama stocks tool-related giftware including chocolate tools, T-shirts and nightshirts printed with tools, clocks and picture frames made of recycled engine parts, tool-shaped jewelry and toy tools.

"I find when I wear a [tool] pin, it's a good conversation starter," said Bass.

Bass has always enjoyed the marketing aspect of business. Her creative flair often plays a role, although she has not done all the design work herself.

"Business can be really boring," she admitted. "You do the same thing day in, day out. I always want to improve something or change something. They say if it's not broken, don't fix it, but I literally walk from room to room saying, 'How can I improve this?'"

Book recounts the time boxing was a 'Jewish sport'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — How it got to be called "the sweet science" is never explained in When Boxing Was A Jewish Sport (Praeger Publishers).

Boxing, by its nature, is anything but sweet, though it could be argued there is a "scientific" element in the process of pummeling an opponent into unconsciousness.

In fact, author Allen Bodner recounts, Jewish pugilists were known as "boxers," who studied the intricacies of the game and were able to avoid being hit, versus "fighters," who stood toe to toe with an opponent and traded punches until somebody went down.

Leaf defenceman Mathieu Schneider will be featured in next week's CJN.

As the title of the book suggests, there was a time when Jews were prominent participants in the sport of boxing. From the turn of the century until about 1950, Jews could be found on undercards and as main eventers throughout the United States, particularly on the eastern seaboard. Contrary to stereotypes of the Jew as bookish intellectuals, in that time span, a subculture of Jewish fighters, trainers, managers and promoters arose who dominated the sport. That included huge numbers of fight fans who filled numerous arenas and even gymnasiums to follow the exploits of their favorite pug-nosed pugilists.

The book's one-and-a-half page appendix gives proof to the contention that Jews could mix it up with the best of them, as it outlines 29 Jewish world champions in nine weight categories. Ten times, Jewish champions fought Jewish contenders for world titles.

Notable by its omission from the list of champions is the name of Max Baer, world heavyweight title holder in 1935.

Though he wore a Star of David on his trunks – as did many other boxers – Baer was not Jewish, Bodner contends. Most of the fighters interviewed by Bodner took the position that Baer wasn't Jewish while the author's father, a boxing aficionado, claims to have seen physical proof while visiting Baer's dressing room that the fighter had no distinctive Jewish attributes.

Even without Baer, the annals of boxing history are replete with Jewish title holders. The greatest and most beloved of all was Benny Leonard, light heavyweight champion from 1917 to 1925. "A model of personal decorum and a visible and committed Jew," Leonard "remains the one most admired by both fans and other fighters," Bodner writes.

Knocked out only four times in more than 200 fights, Leonard lost only one decision (when fouled) between 1913 and 1932.

Leonard, though not the first Jewish champion, was so revered that he served as a role model for numerous young Jewish men seeking to make a few bucks in the hard scrabble life of pre-war America. Other Jewish title holders included: Abe Attell, featherweight champion from 1901-12; Ted "Kid" Lewis; Harry Lewis; Barney Ross; Lew Tendler; Charlie White; Jackie "Kid" Berg; Joe Choyinski; and Louis "Kid" Kaplan.

Bodner points out that many Jewish fighters came from traditional families, spoke a smattering of Yiddish, went to synagogue and married within the faith. All were proud Jews but few got into the game to negate anti-Semitic stereotypes of Jews as weaklings.

Boxing in the first half of 20th century was a tremendously popular sport and it offered second generation Jews (as well as the sons of Irish and Italian immigrants) the opportunity to make good money regardless of mainstream social prejudice.

"Jews in boxing," Bodner writes, "encountered virtually no anti-Semitism either in the ring or outside it. So many of the fighters, trainers, promoters and managers were Jewish that it would have been difficult for anti-Semitism to obtain a foothold."

Benny Leonard was perhaps the greatest Jewish boxer ever.

By 1928, in fact, Jews "were the dominant nationality in professional prizefighting…During the years 1910-40, there were 26 Jewish world champions." According to Bodner, "throughout the 1920s and '30s, approximately 16 percent of the champions were Jewish, but nearly one-third of the fighters were also Jewish."

Full of colorful anecdotes that illustrate a long past era in Jewish sporting history, When Boxing Was a Jewish Sport is not all saccharin platitudes. Bodner devotes a chapter to the mob influence on the game (which started in earnest after the repeal of prohibition) and on head injuries that often result from years of taking punches.

While boxing ranks lower in fatalities (.13 per thousand) than other sports like scuba diving or horse racing (12.8 per thousand), brain damage is a serious problem. According to one study, cited by Bodner, 17 percent of those who boxed for six to nine years displayed brain damage while another study suggests the figure may be as high as 55 percent.

Of the numerous Jewish boxers interviewed by Bodner, many got out of the fight game at a relatively young age and appear to be free of lasting damage. Only one denied head injuries were an occupational hazard, while almost all the others acknowledged the sport's dangers. One, Charles Gellman, believes the sport should be banned.

Despite the risks, another former fighter, Joey Varoff, described his love of the sport this way: "There's a thrill…There's something about being in there alone with somebody. I can't explain it to you. I loved it. I loved the sense of challenge …Also, it shows you how much guts you really have. You come off the floor, you get knocked down, you get up…I didn't know if I had courage, but I found myself that I had courage. I never quit in a fight. It's something within you."

The Inside Back

My mission should I choose to accept it...

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

My assignment – should I decide to accept it – was to pen a regular column that would explore the grittier, less hoity-toity side of life in Jewish Toronto. Or to find interesting, offbeat people whose stories may not be a natural fit for the news pages. Or perhaps to describe new, exciting programs or projects.

Gauntlet picked up; challenge accepted. After a decade here, I should know interesting stuff when I see it.

But this inaugural column will buck those parameters, at least this time.

Judith (not her real name) is interesting all right, but for all the wrong reasons. She's a petite and chipper 44-year-old Hamilton resident, mother of three teenaged girls, and for the first time in her life, angry at something she used to hold almost sacrosanct: Israel.

Although she doesn't cut the figure of a trailblazer, Judith is headed in that direction. She just wants to know one simple thing: How is it that her ex-husband has been able to get away with ignoring court-ordered child support just because he now lives in Israel?

It may sound like a straightforward legal conundrum. But then again, is there such a thing?

Her case has baffled the experts. Women at the forefront of issues pertaining to gittin (Jewish divorce decrees) and agunot (Jewish women unable to remarry religiously because their husbands have denied them a get) were stumped when told of Judith's plight by The CJN.

Her story is simple enough.

Judith and her Israeli-born husband were married in Hamilton in 1976 and filed for divorce 11 years later. Her husband, a physician, held citizenships of both Israel and Canada. Their first daughter was born in Israel. The two others are Canadian born.

Judith received her get in 1988. After the civil divorce was granted in 1989, an Ontario court ordered her husband to pay $600 a month in child support. Judith did not ask for alimony.

He paid faithfully for the next few years, and then fell behind, owing $2,400. Then, in 1993, he suddenly upped and returned to Israel. There's been not a penny since. As of this month, he owes about $36,000 plus interest.

"And there doesn't seem to be anything I can do about it," Judith sighs, nursing a coffee. A teacher, she's on disability because of the stress of being a single mother. Luckily, she has a loving family to help with expenses. With daughters aged 13, 15 and 19, those expenses are high and climbing, especially now that the eldest is in university.

Her ex is a licensed doctor in Israel and about to come into an inheritance. But his wages and assets cannot be garnisheed on the strength of an Ontario court order.

Family lawyers contacted by The CJN agreed the case sounds like one for the Israeli courts. Last summer, Judith wrote an Israeli lawyer, who replied he was unable to take the case because he felt he could not do an effective enough job.

In the meantime, she's been informed by her local support office that there is no reciprocal agreement on child support between Canada and Israel. "There is one between Canada and Bangladesh," she says bitterly. Each year, she says, the countries of the world meet in The Hague to sign or renew agreements on a wide variety of measures. While Israel has signed agreements on child abduction, it has yet to sign covenants on the enforcement of child support payments.

"You know, I used to love and support Israel no matter what," Judith says. "Now, I feel very disillusioned about Israel – on this point, anyway."

The provincial attorney general's Family Responsibility Office confirms Canada has no reciprocity treaty with Israel. The office keeps track of 163,000 family support cases, totalling over $1 billion in arrears over the past decade, but does not track the whereabouts of the nearly 8,000 deadbeat dads who have skipped the province.

Israel's embassy in Ottawa says it doesn't get involved in cases like this.

Now, Judith is looking for a reasonably-priced Israeli lawyer (one wanted $6,000 up front) who would work for a percentage of her award. She also wants to talk to other women in the same boat.

Meantime, her ex, in a perverse kind of irony, continues to exploit Israel for what it was intended to be: a haven.

APPLE MERINGUE DESSERT

2 lbs. Granny Smith apples or any tart apple	2 cloves
1 cup white sugar	1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 tblsp. honey	pinch nutmeg
1/2 cup water	1/2 cup raisins
1 tsp. vanilla	2 tblsp. Grand Marnier or Cognac

Peel, core and thickly slice apples. Set aside. Cook water and sugar until syrupy. Add the spices, apples and raisins. Cook covered until tender, but apples still hold their shape. Add the liqueur and the honey. Place in a baking dish.

Make Italian Meringue:	1/4 cup water
1 cup sugar	4 egg whites

Stir sugar and water over heat until sugar is completely dissolved. Let cook until it becomes a thick syrup. Whip whites until they form soft peaks. Slowly pour the hot syrup into the whites, beating all along until cool. Spread meringue on top of apples. Bake in preheated 350°F oven until golden (watch carefully). Chill.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Why is it that my dear friend Lori will not go out on a date unless she knows in advance the guy is a professional and wants to get married, have two kids, educate them in Hebrew school and live in Thornhill.

Okay, maybe I am exaggerating a bit, but here is a girl who is 32 years old, sweet, pretty, bright and doesn't seem to understand all this can be discussed after you know whether the two of you have an attraction or bond to continue dating. She is missing so many opportunities to meet some very eligible, interesting bachelors because they can't or won't be qualified in advance. Needless to say, not only does she scare them off, she is getting quite a reputation.

I know she reads your column; maybe she'll see herself in this letter.

Dating Dilemma

Dear Dating Dilemma,

I understand this is difficult to watch. As a caring friend, your mind seems so clear that Lori is missing the boat; however, you have to understand that to most people, blind dates are not a picnic at the best of times.

Your friend sounds panicked. It sounds like she wants to have a family and doesn't feel she has time to waste on useless dates, which in her mind will go nowhere.

At 32, she is no doubt thinking of her biological clock as well; however I too feel it is wrong to put the cart before the horse.

A cup of coffee with an interesting person will take two hours, tops, out of her life and you never know when it may click. A relationship needs time to grow, time for two people to get to know each other, to decide if they are compatible and if they have the same values.

Your friend has to relax a bit and have enough confidence to know that the people she cares about and trusts would not introduce her to someone inappropriate. They care about her and want the best for her as well.

A person can easily be scared off on a first date if they are asked, "So how many kids do you want." It is not human nature to commit to something that important so quickly.

Lori shouldn't feel she is wasting her time. She should enjoy the coffee, dinners, dancing, music, walks and anything else that courting has to offer.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Research

for a healthy journey through life

AT THE MOMENT OF CONCEPTION IT BEGINS: THE incredibly intricate process of constructing a unique human being, one molecule at a time. From infancy to maturity to old age, our bodies are built and our growth and development regulated by the complex molecular processes that govern all life on this planet.

Scientists are beginning to understand how these molecular processes guide our growth, development and aging.

In the beginning | Early steps | Teenage years | Adult years | Towards old age

They are also learning what happens when these processes go wrong. As a result, in the past few years, researchers at centres such as the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, Mount Sinai Hospital's world-renowned research facility, have made huge strides in understanding the root causes of medical problems as diverse as premature labour, cancer, and osteoporosis.

Supplement to The Globe and Mail, October 29,1997 and The Canadian Jewish News, November 6, 1997

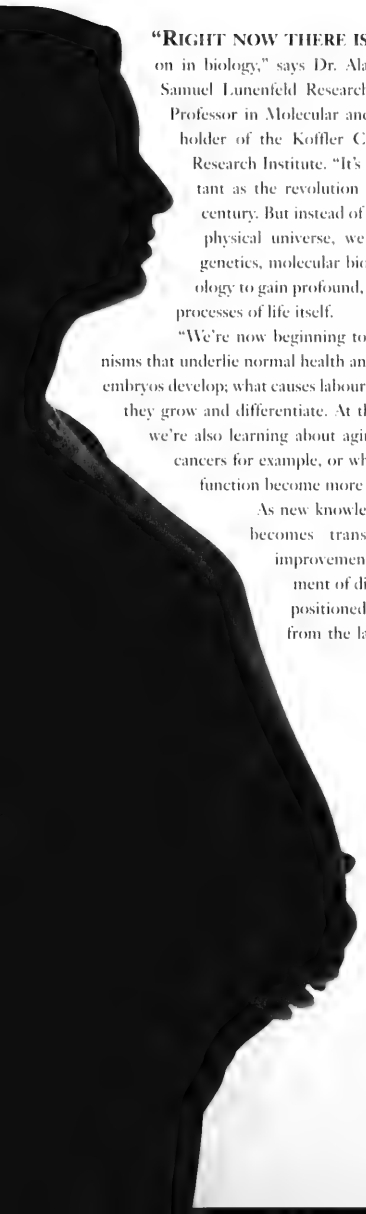
MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL



"RIGHT NOW THERE IS A REVOLUTION GOING on in biology," says Dr. Alan Bernstein, Director of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, Anne Tanenbaum Professor in Molecular and Developmental Biology and holder of the Koffler Chair for the Director of the Research Institute. "It's a revolution at least as important as the revolution in atomic physics earlier this century. But instead of learning about the rules of the physical universe, we are using the disciplines of genetics, molecular biology, biochemistry and physiology to gain profound, revolutionary insights into the processes of life itself.

"We're now beginning to understand the basic mechanisms that underlie normal health and growth. We're learning how embryos develop; what causes labour and how cells communicate as they grow and differentiate. At the other end of the spectrum, we're also learning about aging, why we tend to get more cancers for example, or why disorders in bone and brain function become more common."

As new knowledge is acquired, the challenge becomes translating these insights into improvements in the prevention and treatment of disease. "The Institute is ideally positioned to bring research findings from the laboratory to the patient," says Dr. Bernstein. "For one thing, many of our scientists are also practicing physicians. They can readily grasp the practical applications of research. As well, we have strong links to the broader medical community. Our scientists routinely share their findings with doctors here and at other hospitals."

We are now beginning to understand the basic mechanisms that underlie normal health and growth.

The Institute's ties to Toronto's academic community are also strong. All Institute scientists hold faculty positions at the University of Toronto, and the 86 graduate students training at the Institute are all registered in Masters or PhD programs at the university.

Its ongoing program of research and development is part of Mount Sinai Hospital's commitment to providing The Best Medicine to its community. By providing the best scientific investigators with the best equipment and translating their findings into the practice of medicine, the war on disease is slowly but surely advanced. Medicine and research have always moved forward in tandem. Today's spectacular scientific advances hold the promise of great breakthroughs in medical practice in the foreseeable future — breakthroughs that will help ensure a healthy voyage from the earliest stages of life through to old age.

Today's spectacular scientific advances hold the promise of great breakthroughs in medical practice in the foreseeable future.

How an embryo knows back from front

Co-Head of the Institute's Program in Development and Fetal Health Dr. Janet Rossant and her team are working to learn more about the genes that regulate pattern formation in the mouse embryo. They have identified several of the genes which "tell" the developing embryo which is its front end, which is its back end and where its body axis should be. "We have identified a particularly important source of such signals. Now we're trying to find out how these signals set up pattern formation," explains Dr. Rossant.

Why should research scientists care about how patterns develop in mouse embryos? "We know from studies of humans that mutations in some developmental genes are associated, not only with birth defects, but even with a genetic predisposition to various diseases such as cancer," explains Dr. Rossant. "By understanding normal development, we're starting to have a better understanding of what can go wrong, how human disease is caused."

Dr. Rossant and Dr. Jay Cross, another Institute scientist, are also studying the genes which control the formation of the trophoblast, the cell type that makes up most of the placenta. The first cells to develop in the embryo, trophoblasts are absolutely essential for further growth.

"In the past few years, we have begun to identify the genes required to make trophoblast cells," says Dr. Rossant. "These same genes are present in humans. We're very interested to know whether mutations or alterations in expression of these genes are involved in trophoblastic disease in people."

By understanding normal development, we're starting to have a better understanding of what can go wrong.

Fetal health related to adult health

RECENT RESEARCH SUGGESTS PROPER FETAL development may promote good health in later life. "The thinking is that during fetal life all of your organ systems and physiologic systems are programmed," explains Dr. Stephen Lye, Co-Head of the Institute's Program in Development and Fetal Health. "During this time, genetic programs are set up to regulate blood pressure, blood sugar levels, neural system functions and so on. If there's perturbation of the fetal environment, then whatever is being programmed at the time may not be programmed correctly. For example, if the fetus fails to get sufficient nutrients or oxygen due to a poorly functioning placenta at a time when your blood pressure systems are being programmed, then the thinking is that this can lead to hypertension in later life."

If this is so, it gives even greater urgency to the work of Dr. Lye and his fellow researchers, whose research is aimed at promoting fetal health during pregnancy.

One common problem during pregnancy is pre-eclampsia, a condition associated with elevated blood pressure in the pregnant mother. "The only real treatment is to remove the placenta," explains Dr. Lye. "But if you deliver the placenta, you have to deliver the baby, so although pre-eclampsia is primarily a medical problem with the mother, it also leads to prematurity."

Invasion of the trophoblasts (or fetal attraction)

WHAT CAUSES PRE-ECLAMPSIA? THE ANSWER APPEARS to be related to the genetics of pregnancy. Under normal circumstances, around 9 to 13 weeks into a pregnancy, trophoblast cells invade the uterus and help remodel the blood vessels there. The result is increased blood flow to the uterus. This is desirable during pregnancy because it channels more nutrients and oxygen to the placenta and fetus.

"In pre-eclampsia, for some reason, the invasion of trophoblast cells doesn't occur properly," says Dr. Lye. "As a result, the arteries never get remodelled and so blood flow doesn't increase to the extent that it should. This, we believe, sets up a lot of problems which ultimately lead to pre-eclampsia."

What regulates the invasion of the trophoblast cells? The answer appears to be biochemical growth factors called TGFβ3. "In work conducted by my associate, Dr. Isabella Caniggia, we've found that in normal pregnancies TGF Beta levels were relatively high in the first several weeks, but then fell dramatically around eight weeks, just at the time trophoblasts are supposed to invade the uterus," said Dr. Lye. "This decline in TGF Beta levels may be the body's equivalent of taking the brake off, allowing the trophoblast cells to invade."

In pre-eclamptic pregnancies, however, the story is very different. Dr. Caniggia recently found that levels of TGF Beta remain high throughout pre-eclamptic pregnancies. "This suggests that in pre-eclamptic pregnancies, TGF Beta is never 'turned off.' As a result, the invasion of the trophoblasts never occurs," explains Dr. Lye.

This research opens intriguing possibilities for early diagnosis and treatment of pre-eclampsia. If blood levels of TGF Beta can be measured at key phases of pregnancy, the disposition to pre-eclampsia can be predicted. Better yet, this research may ultimately point the way to treatment of this condition which is so potentially damaging to mothers and their infants.

The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Centre

On October 27, 1997, a significant milestone for the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute was realized with the opening of The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Centre for Molecular Medicine and Human Genome Research.

This Centre is dedicated to discovering the molecular basis of normal and disease processes with the goal of understanding, curing and preventing disease.

The Centre will enable scientists to build on their internationally recognized strengths and contribute to the worldwide effort to advance biomedical research.

The creation of this Centre was made possible through a partnership with the Canada/Ontario Infrastructure Works Program with support from the City of Toronto and Metropolitan Toronto and the generosity of Joseph and Wolf Lebovic.

This research opens intriguing possibilities for early diagnosis and treatment of pre-eclampsia.

How worms may help do away with wheelchairs

WITH MOST DANGEROUS CHILDHOOD DISEASES now under control, the period from birth to maturity tends to be a healthy time for most children. One of the greatest health dangers during the teenage years is injury resulting from motor-vehicle accidents. Particularly tragic are accidents which damage the spinal cord, partially or totally paralyzing the victim. One day it may be possible to help victims recover from these accidents thanks to research on a humble worm known as C. elegans.

Dr. Joseph Culotti, a Senior Scientist in the Institute, is investigating how the spinal cord of C. elegans is formed. "What we've discovered is a molecular mechanism for guiding the growth of neurons in this worm," says Dr. Culotti. "We've identified a guidance cue molecule that gives directional information to the growing neurons, in essence telling them in which direction to grow."

The guidance cue molecule acts almost like a one-way road sign for developing neurons, guiding some in one direction, and some in another. "It 'says' to some neurons 'grow away from me,' and to other neurons 'grow towards me,' explains Dr. Culotti.

Dr. Culotti's team has also found receptors on the growing neurons which receive information from guidance cue molecules, allowing the worm's neurons to respond appropriately. Startlingly, Dr. Culotti, working in collaboration with scientists in the United States, has found that similar molecules guide growing neurons along the same axis in the developing human spinal cord. "We're now confident that what we find in the worm will be relevant to the human spinal cord," says Dr. Culotti. "We're trying to discover additional guidance molecules in the worm."

Ultimately, the research done by Dr. Culotti and his team could lay the foundation for treatment or even regrowth of damaged spinal cords in humans.

The balancing act of the bones

While osteoarthritis affects cartilage and bones in the joints, other disorders of old age affect the bones themselves. Spine, hip and wrist fractures are a serious problem in the elderly, and can lead to death or, more often, to a loss of mobility. Trying to understand why bones become weaker as people age is the focus of Senior Scientist Dr. Marc Grynpas and his research team.

"We are looking at the mechanism by which people start losing bone. We're studying the exact nature of bone loss, and how the changing micro architecture of the bone and bone quality can lead to fractures," explains Dr. Grynpas. "Our goal is not only to understand the mechanism, but to find strategies to prevent fractures."

In the living body, bone is constantly being formed and resorbed (broken down and recycled) in an elaborate balancing act. The aging process often disrupts this fine balance, tipping the scales so that small amounts of bone are lost year by year. If this process is accelerated, as in osteoporosis, bones eventually become thin and fragile. The result is fractures.

"The emphasis in therapeutics has been on preventing resorption," explains Dr. Grynpas. "One way to do this is by using drugs such as bisphosphonates. These drugs prevent bone resorption and, therefore, slow down bone turnover. We're now researching a third generation of bisphosphonates."

Several studies are now underway. One looks at the effect of bisphosphonates on bone and cartilage. The results are surprising: third generation bisphosphonates seem to protect cartilage as well as bone from arthritis-related damage when given early in the disease process.

Dr. Grynpas and his colleagues are also studying other factors which affect the health and strength of bone. They are looking at the effect of fluoride on bone formation, the way in which bone mineralization increases with age, the accumulation of microdamage in bone with aging, and the effect of specific genes on mineralization.

"At a fundamental level, we're working to understand the molecular mechanisms by which fragility comes into bone," explains Dr. Grynpas. From that understanding may come better ways to keep bones healthy and strong during the later years of life.

Choosing a career: An important step in life's journey

Science is a living endeavour. To flourish, it must constantly attract bright young people. But today's teenagers know that choosing a career is a major step. To make the right choice, they need answers to some basic questions. What do scientists actually do? How do you become a scientist? Is the work interesting?

To answer such questions, the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute has developed a Youth Outreach Program designed to give Toronto high school students a better idea of what scientists actually do. One of the program's key components is the annual Science Day for High School Students.

Students meet "real" scientists

"Science Day was developed for teenagers preparing to enter university science programs," explains Dr. Sharon Abel, an Institute Senior Scientist and Director of the Institute's Youth Outreach Program. "It's intended to introduce students to the research that goes on in our Institute, and to let them meet with graduate and post-doctoral students to talk about the experience of becoming a scientist."

Over the last few years, the format of Science Day has evolved in response to student needs. Since 1995, 30 Metropolitan Toronto-area high schools have been participating in the program. Each school sends its six top science students for an intensive half-day session which includes lectures and visits to Institute labs. "With this format, we can target the best students in a large number of schools," explains Dr. Abel. This year, students chose between workshops on molecular biology and cancer, bone biology and biomechanics, neurobiology, health and disease, developmental biology and genetics, and fetal health.

Sending the teachers back to school

One of the best ways to reach high school students is through their teachers. For this reason, the Institute has developed the Teach the Teachers program to give high school teachers a chance to learn about the latest developments in biomedical research from practicing scientists. Organized by Dr. William Mak, Instructor in Biotechnology at Seneca College, the program brings selected Toronto-area high school teachers into the Institute for a week of lectures, discussions and hands-on laboratory work. This year, the Institute plans to expand its outreach program still further.

SciHigh will offer a "personal view" of science

A new initiative called SciHigh will send teams consisting of one male and one female Institute graduate student out to Toronto-area high schools to talk science to teens in grades nine and ten.

"We plan to focus on these grades because we want to turn high school students on to science," explains Dr. Abel. "Our team members will talk about what attracted them to science and why they find it interesting. It will be a very personal interaction, not a lecture."

By introducing teenagers to young scientists who can tell them about the excitement of a career in science, the Institute is helping young Canadians take a vital step on their journey through life - the decision about which career is best for them.

When cancer runs in the family

SCIENTIFIC DISCOVERY IS ALREADY BRINGING tangible benefits to patients. For example, research has improved the diagnosis and screening of patients with hereditary forms of cancer.

Breast cancer, which affects one of every 10 women in North America, sometimes runs in families. Inherited breast, ovarian and colon cancers are now being intensively studied by Institute scientists in partnership with Mount Sinai's Pathology Department and the Ontario Cancer Genetic Network (OCGN), a provincially funded organization that investigates hereditary cancers in the province.

"We're trying to answer questions ranging from: 'what's the definition of a high-risk family?' to 'what are the effects of certain mutations on individual outcomes?'" explains Dr. Irene Andrulis, a Senior Scientist in the Institute and OCGN Director. "We're particularly interested in detecting mutations in genes which predispose people to breast, ovarian or colon cancer." The OCGN and doctors at Mount Sinai are also heavily involved in counselling patients and their relatives from families at high risk for inherited cancers.

By studying high-risk cancers, scientists hope to learn about the much larger number of cases where heredity does not play an obvious role. "We're not just interested in high risk cases," says Dr. Andrulis. "We're looking at the frequency of these mutations in low-to-moderate risk cases, and we're trying to learn what role environmental factors play in the disease.

"Some of the genes involved in breast cancer don't put the carrier at 100 per cent risk. For example, some individuals of Ashkenazi (European) Jewish descent carry certain mutations in the BRCA 1 and 2 genes. Their risk of breast cancer is about 56 per cent and the risk of ovarian cancer is about 16 per cent. Yes — there are a lot of people who will get breast or ovarian cancer. On the other hand, there are also a lot who won't, even though they carry the very same mutations. So the next question is: 'why not?' Are there other genes that are protective? These are the type of things we want to find out."

Cancer patients with a strong family history of ovarian or breast cancer are referred to one of the OCGN's clinics across the province. There, a medical history is taken and analyzed. Patients from confirmed high-risk families are offered counselling and genetic testing. If they accept, and if test results identify a genetic risk for hereditary cancer, patients' family members also become eligible for counselling and testing.

The Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai is a member of the OCGN. "Among other things, we assess familial risk here," explains Centre Director Dr. Pam Goodwin, also a Senior Scientist in the Institute. "We determine whether patients have a strong family history of breast or ovarian cancer. If they do, we offer genetic testing and help with interpreting test results. And if testing reveals the presence of mutations associated with breast cancer, we talk to them about management of their risk."

Dr. Goodwin is also heavily involved with research into the genetics of breast cancer. "We're especially interested in the effect of mutations on breast cancer outcomes and in the impact of different treatments," she explains. This research has immediate as well as long-term value. "As we learn more about the biology of breast cancer, we can help patients make clearer, better-informed choices about options such as prophylactic surgery."

The Institute is also studying hereditary forms of colon cancer. "About one per cent of colon cancer cases are caused by an inherited form of the disease known as FAP (Familial Adenomatous Polyposis)," explains Dr. Steven Gallinger, Scientist in the Institute and Co-Director of The Steve Atanas Stavro Familial Gastrointestinal Cancer Registry.

Dr. Gallinger, with Dr. Andrulis, co-directs Mount Sinai's Centre for Cancer Genetics, a unique multidisciplinary program that brings together clinicians, genetic counsellors, ethicists, pathologists and researchers interested in the problem of inherited forms of cancer.

Individuals with FAP have characteristic mutations in a gene called APC. They are certain to develop colon cancer at some point in their adult life. About 300 FAP families in Canada are registered with The Steve Atanas Stavro Familial Gastrointestinal Cancer Registry at Mount Sinai.

"We can now look for a mutation in this gene in families with a history of FAP," explains Dr. Gallinger. "If we find it, we can test other people in the family to see if they also have the mutation. If they do, they're almost certainly going to get the disease unless action is taken. However, if the colon is removed, their cancer risk is almost eliminated."

We believe that genetic factors contribute to almost every cancer.

Cheaper, more effective testing

"JUST AS IMPORTANT, IF YOU ARE FROM one of these families, but you haven't inherited the mutation, then we can inform you that your risk of developing colon cancer is the same as the general population. You don't have to have colonoscopies every couple of years at such a young age. Anxiety and discomfort are reduced — and so is the cost of inappropriately screening these people by the clinical method."

Dr. Gallinger and collaborators across the province are also setting up The Ontario Registry for Studies of Familial Colon Cancer, a large scale registry for patients with HNPCC (Hereditary Non-Polyposis Colon Cancer), a hereditary form of colon cancer which accounts for about five per cent of cases. The registry will collect family history data and samples from HNPCC patients over a three-year period. The resulting library of data and tissue samples from patients will be a very valuable scientific resource — one that will help researchers in their search for the as-yet-unknown genes which play a role in both inherited and non-hereditary forms of colon cancer.

"We believe that genetic factors contribute to almost every cancer," says Dr. Gallinger. "We've now identified single gene diseases where if you have a specific abnormality in a critical gene, you have a very high likelihood of developing the disease, and it's a pretty obvious correlation. The challenge for the next decade is to understand polygenic diseases in which a patient may have five or six or perhaps 20 minor abnormalities in genes rather than one major mutation of the type that causes FAP or HNPCC."

Malfunctions in our genes undoubtedly contribute to many of the serious diseases and deteriorative disorders associated with old age. One of the most painful of these is osteoarthritis, which attacks and gradually destroys the cartilage of joints. Osteoarthritis increases substantially in people over 55, and can have a very negative effect on quality of life.

Senior Institute Scientist Dr. Tony Cruz and his colleagues are working to understand osteoarthritis. "We're focusing on the molecules involved in the breakdown of articular cartilage," says Dr. Cruz. "The loss of cartilage results from an imbalance between degradation and synthesis. One of the reasons for this shift toward degradation is an increase in the production of enzymes called metalloproteases which break down cartilage. We've been trying to identify the genes which regulate the production of these enzymes and the specific DNA sequences that regulate their expression."

Sending messages by molecule

UNDERSTANDING EVENTS AT THE MOLECULAR level is bringing scientists ever closer to a fundamental understanding of how living creatures develop and function. Ground-breaking research by Senior Scientist Dr. Tony Pawson, Head of the Institute's Program in Molecular Biology and Cancer and holder of the Apotex Chair in Molecular Oncology, has yielded important insights into how cells communicate, using "molecular messages" to convey information to each other. Intercellular communication allows the cells in our bodies to grow, proliferate, specialize and respond to dangerous events like infection or wounding in an organized, harmonious fashion.

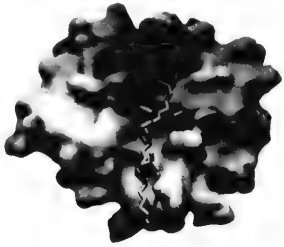
"What makes us different from an amoeba is the ability of our cells to 'talk' to one another," says Dr. Pawson. "It's a fundamental feature of complex organisms such as ourselves. Also it turns out that many — or even most — diseases represent a breakdown in the process of communication. For example, in cancer, the affected cell 'thinks' it's being told to grow when it's not. The communication process has broken down. In a sense, the cancer cell is 'hearing voices.'" Other major diseases such as diabetes, atherosclerosis and Alzheimer's may also be caused by problems in cell communication.

How do cells "talk" to each other? When a cell sends a signal to another cell, it does so with a molecule — a hormone or a factor like insulin. Signalling molecules bind to a receptor on the target cell and pass along the "message." The receptor then relays the message, inducing a change in cell function.

"We're especially interested in what happens in the target cell once the receptor is activated," explains Dr. Pawson. "We've learned that each cell contains what we call 'modules.' These are protein components which are common to many different proteins. Signals are transmitted within a cell via a series of interactions between these protein modules. It's a sort of molecular communications code."

Scientists are now beginning to comprehend the basics of this code — and the implications are enormous. Cell signalling is so fundamental that a better understanding of it may pave the way for dramatic breakthroughs in medical practice. "The ground is moving under our feet," jokes Dr. Pawson.

As so often happens in science, Dr. Pawson and his colleagues came to their initial insights on cell signalling via research on something quite different. "In fact, we were investigating an obscure cancer virus in chickens," recalls Dr. Pawson. "Real fundamental breakthroughs in understanding often come that way — which just underlines the vital importance of supporting basic, untargetted research."



Standing on the threshold

RESEARCH DONE AT THE SAMUEL LUNENFELD RESEARCH INSTITUTE AND OTHER CENTRES around the world is bringing us to an exciting threshold. "We first have to understand the mechanisms that underlie disease," says Dr. Bernstein. "And now, for the very first time, we are beginning to understand those mechanisms. It's happened so quickly that most people don't quite realize it."

"The challenge now is to exploit this new knowledge," says Dr. Bernstein. "In cancer for instance, can we develop therapies which will only kill those cells with mutations? Can we exploit our new understanding of the molecular code by which cells talk to each other to devise new ways of treating disease? It seems likely that this fundamental understanding of health and disease will lead to entirely novel approaches to therapy."

What is needed is a long-term commitment. Research costs money and takes time. Is Canadian society prepared to make a long-term commitment?

"Research should not be viewed as an expense, but as an investment," says Dr. Bernstein. "As a nation we spend billions of dollars on health care. We reinvest only a very, very small amount of our health care dollar in research. That would be okay if we could cure most diseases. The fact is, we can't."

Medical research is not only an investment, it is a tried-and-true way to create sustainable employment. "Stimulating health research is a fabulous way to ensure new jobs for young people in an exciting, knowledge-based industry," says Dr. Bernstein.

The Institute itself provides a good example of the economic benefits of research. Not only does it employ people (including over 160 young scientists), but it also helps create jobs by partnering with large pharmaceutical and biotechnology companies to translate its research findings into new medical tools. Some Institute scientists have also started spin-off companies to turn pure research into new therapies. For example, Dr. Jim Dennis, Senior Scientist at the Institute, together with colleagues from the University of Toronto, has launched a company to develop new treatments for cancer and other diseases.

"By investing money to make people healthy, we invest in everyone's future," says Dr. Bernstein. "Scientific research leads to exciting new insights into how our bodies work. These discoveries, in turn, lead to new technologies, new understanding of disease, new companies and new jobs. We ensure that health care will be better in the years ahead. We ensure our children will benefit from having the best medicine science can devise. It's one of those rare situations where everyone truly wins." ●

Is PA hiding arms for Iraq?

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority's (PA) embassy in Baghdad is being used as a repository for secret documents that relate to Iraq's buildup of unconventional weapons, Iraqi opposition sources said last week.

They said the site's diplomatic immunity evidently keeps the documents beyond the reach of UN arms inspectors.

The documents relate to the purchase of raw materials required for Iraq's manufacture and deployment of weapons of mass destruction, a senior figure in the underground movement to overthrow President Saddam Hussein said.

He attributed his knowledge of the documents' contents to "sources inside Iraqi intelligence."

Axworthy in Israel

OTTAWA — Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy has begun his week-long trip to the Middle East. He was scheduled to visit Israel on Nov. 11.

Axworthy is also slated to visit Cairo, Amman, Beirut, Damascus, Ankara, and the West Bank and Gaza Strip. He will lead a 15-member Canadian business delegation to the fourth Middle East/North Africa Economic Conference in Doha, Qatar.

While in Israel, Axworthy was expected to pursue clarification on the steps taken by Israel to ensure that Canadian passports will not be misused again.

Details in next week's CJN.

A look at Toronto's Jews from Russia

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Approximately 30,000 Russian Jews live in the Greater Toronto Area. In a two-part series, the first of which we publish today, Bill Gladstone looks at that dynamic and growing community on north Bathurst Street.

TORONTO — Last Yom Kippur, an estimated 5,000 people attended religious services hosted by the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Toronto at a North York high school.

Since far more showed up than the building could actually contain, many stood outside, as in previous years, unaware of what was happening inside, but ostensibly feeling a connection to the holiday and to their Jewish roots.

"They couldn't hear the services, but it was still OK for them," says Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, the community's spiritual leader. "They came just to socialize and be part of it."

Although they remain largely an unintegrated mass with limited connections to organized Jewish life, the Russians are the single largest group of Jews in the Greater Toronto Area. Estimates of their number range from 25,000 to 35,000. More arrive each month.

So many Russian-Jewish immigrants now live along the Bathurst Street corridor, particularly between Sheppard and Steeles avenues, that cyrillic street signs are common. Furthermore, Russian seems to be the predominant language in scores of apartment buildings and it's hard to find a bakery, restaurant or pharmacy where you're not served by a Russian-Jewish émigré. There are Russian-style restaurants, nightclubs, grocery stores, Russian-speaking doctors, dentists, lawyers, driving schools, even several Russian newspapers.

North Bathurst Street, of course, is no Brighton Beach, New York's immensely colorful ethnic neighborhood that boasts almost

Rabbi slams suggestion to reduce aid to Israel

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel has been "dragged" into the controversy over conversions because of the Law of Return's definition of who is a Jew, says Rabbi Reuven Bulka of the Orthodox Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.

Rabbi Bulka, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress' unity committee, deplored any attempt to reduce aid to Israel, describing it as the guardian of all Jews.

Speaking to a large crowd at the Conservative Adath Israel Congregation, he gave a lengthy review of divisive crises in Jewish history, while at the same time, questioning certain moves by Reform proponents in the conversion dispute.

In Israel itself a three-month reprieve is in effect on the legislation before the Knesset, which would legalize only Orthodox conversions performed there.

"I don't have a lot of good to say about patrilineal descent," he said. "I understand it, but the Canadian Reform rabbis are not rushing to embrace it. It's a mistake for the Reform. Once you open the door the Reform movement will see a big drop in conversions because the need will be over.

"Most Reform rabbis do not think it is wise to force Israel to accept patrilineal descent."

He said he did not agree that the legislation on conversions would "delegitimize" Conservative and Reform rabbis in Israel.

In the discussion period, Rabbi Bulka said it would be "terrific" if Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis in Toronto could get together. "The worst thing would be to give up the attempt."

He was replying to a statement by Rabbi Steven Saltzman of Adath Israel that Orthodox rabbis are refusing to meet with their Conservative and Reform colleagues on any subjects, including aid to Israel.

A piece of noble legislation

One of the problems in Toronto, Rabbi Bulka said, is that some congregations are so large they are a community of their own. Rabbis of all denominations get together in Ottawa, he said.

Rabbi Saltzman said: "I don't know if we [Conservatives and Reform] are so innocent and the Orthodox so guilty. How tolerant are we of Orthodox? I wonder about letting gays and lesbians pray at the Western Wall."

Rabbi Bulka described the Law of Return as "a piece of noble legislation," and said Soviet Jews could not have been rescued without Israel.

But, in the important and urgent rush to save Jews from the Soviet Union, Israel and the Diaspora have created a "Jewish problem," Rabbi Bulka said.

The Ne'eman commission in Israel recommending that all conversions be approved by the Jewish Agency is a good first step, he said.

"For us to expect the government of Israel to consider opposition in North America is like whistling in the wind."

It is only "political reality" to realize that Israel's government will capitulate to its religious partners on the conversion bill in order to stay in power, he said.

"Let's try to solve this problem in North America."

In the question period, Rabbi Bulka denied that he was offering an apology for the actions of the Orthodox.

One discussant said the speaker had failed to point out that those opposing the conversion bill are not stopping their aid to Israel, but asking it be directed to non-religious projects.

There is tolerance "to a degree" in Israel to non-Orthodox religions, Rabbi Saltzman said. "I was a rabbi in Israel for five years and I was able to function though I couldn't perform weddings."

Letter writing campaign fails to persuade

Across my desk last week I received nine letters concerning the City of David Christian missionary church, which opened two months ago in the Steeles and Bathurst area north of Toronto.

As readers may recall, the opening of the church evoked a sharp and angry response from the Jewish community. Both the opening and that response were the subjects of considerable press coverage in the Jewish and general media.

Although the controversy surrounding the church has subsided, the "file" is still open.

In its editorial of Sept. 18, The CJN regretted the opening of the church and deplored the use in its sign of the term synagogue alongside Hebrew writing.

The letters we have received have been, obviously, in response to our editorial. Some of the letters are addressed personally to me; some are copies of correspondence sent to the landlord, or to the property manager, or to other media outlets.

It is clear however, from the common phrases that appear in all of the letters that they are part of a centralized, orchestrated write-in campaign.

Rather than reproduce the letters in our letters-to-the-editor section, I have chosen to respond in this space to the letter-writers' main arguments.

• Almost all of the letters begin with an affirmation – the term affirmation appeared a great deal in the letters – of Christianity's Jewish roots.

"First, let me affirm that our roots are Jewish. Historically everyone must agree that Christ was a Jew, the twelve Apostles were Jews and all but one of the New Testament authors were Jewish," wrote Dr. Nelson J. Annan, senior pastor of Bayview Glen Church.

"Our faith in Jesus and our commitment to the Scriptures have imparted to us a deep and sincere love for Jewish people, and a sympathy for their causes and concerns," wrote Linda Russell.

As plainly stated, these affirmations are intended to establish the writers' understanding of and empathy for Jewish theology and the Jewish people. They hope thereby to prove their benign and bona fide intentions towards the Jews. One notes, however, that converting a Jew away from his or her faith is among these benign and bona fide intentions.

There is no concession, nor even slight discomfort with the notion that Jews should be allowed to remain Jews. In fact, the opposite is true for our letter writers. It is a high obligation for them and their colleagues to lead Jews, whose shared common past with theirs they affirm, to embrace Christianity.

• Pastor Annan, is "appalled at the threat to freedom of religion and freedom of speech that has [sic] been raised by those opposed to the Messianic Synagogue.

"Surely our most basic freedoms would allow a gathering to call themselves whatever they wish," he wrote.

In my view, Pastor Annan is absolutely wrong; otherwise, there would be no need for rules regulating accuracy and honesty in any consumer field, labelling and packaging, for example.

In light of the true purpose of the church, it is imperative that the "consumer" public be fully aware of exactly what and who they are.

That is the minimum requirement of elementary honesty.

• "Surely, in a free country, they are free to locate wherever they wish," wrote Pastor Annan.

Regrettably they are. Even though their purpose is patently transparent. We lamented their purpose in The CJN editorial. But we took no issue with the exercise by the church of its right to locate in the north Toronto plaza. We did take issue with the manner in which they opened up.

• Bob and Sue Buckley of Toronto "object to the obvious discriminatory tactics which the leaders of the Jewish community are exerting upon Aetna Life."

The Jews are accused of discriminating against the City of David for deigning to want to protect ourselves, our children, our newly-arrived immigrants, against being victimized by proselytizers.

Echoing original defamation

• A recurring theme that coursed through all of the letters was: "I am saddened that Aetna Canada is bowing under pressure from the perpetrators of this persecution at the expense of the City of David. (My emphasis)

The Jews are accused of persecuting the members and especially the pastor of the City of David. The very language – "persecution" – is an echo of the original defamations some 2,000 years ago, levelled against the Jewish people by doctrinaire Christians, and for which the Jewish people have paid in blood down through the years.

None of these arguments, all of which appeared in variation in the correspondence, is persuasive or moving in the slightest. Nor should we individually or as a community feel defensive over our vigorous efforts to expose and curtail the conversion efforts of the messianic church that calls itself City of David.

Defending Judaism is no less legitimate an activity, intrinsically, than promoting Christianity. The letter-writers do not seem to understand this, despite their professed affirmation of common Jewish roots. They have no loyalty, let alone true sympathy, for Judaism. Their loyalty is to their own faith. But they take umbrage when we Jews express loyalty to our faith, especially when it means choosing to remain Jewish.

In light of these renewed efforts by proselytizers to "capture" more Jews, I repeat the essential points of the editorial of Sept. 18:

"A synagogue is where Jewish prayers are heard, where Jewish doctrine is practised, where Jewish theology is taught and where the Jewish faith is worshipped. City of David is not a synagogue. The use of the term is fraudulent, as is the use of Hebrew on their sign. Both usages are insidious, calculated only to create the association with Judaism and therefore the assumption in the mind of the unknowing public that the place is Jewish. And that association of course is a magnet drawing toward it the confused, the curious and always the lonely.

"The issue for us is not the attempt to proselytize Jews away from the faith of our forebears, although we find the attempt to do so an indignity and contemptible.

"The issue for us is the manner by which this group exercises its right. They venture into the very core of Toronto's Jewish world and by guile and deceit, lure their prey into their anti-Jewish snare."

The writers who invoked the Charter of Rights and Freedoms are conveniently inconsistent and curiously inconsistent when they seek the charter's protection but deny it for others. If the City of David has a right to convert Jews, then the Jews have a right not to be converted.

It is not a subtle argument.

THE SIX BIGGEST MISTAKES PEOPLE MAKE WHEN MANAGING THEIR INVESTMENTS

As Canadians, we should be spending more time thinking about investments and tax strategies.

Most Canadians spend too much time worrying about their RRSP portfolios and not enough time thinking about their overall investment strategy. Remember, your RRSP is limited to $13,500 and if you are in a pension plan, your maximum is even less.

Here are some of the biggest mistakes people make when managing their investments.

1. People rarely know what it is they actually want to accomplish with their money.

Good things rarely happen until investors set specific financial goals and then direct their actions towards the realization of those objectives. Most people simply don't have a financial plan; perhaps it is because they are impatient or they believe they can only get rich from lotteries. What most people don't understand is that money, well invested, can accumulate into significant wealth.

2. Too many people procrastinate endlessly about making financial decisions.

Most investors wait for the "time to be just right" before starting an investment program. Usually, they are baffled by the sheer variety of options and choices and lack the knowledge to act decisively. This procrastination can end up being the greatest barrier to reaching financial goals. The reality is, the time may never be "just right" when investing money. Keep in mind, time is against you. You cannot turn back the clock and regain the compounded growth that has been lost. Worse yet, every day puts you closer to the day when you will need your retirement savings to maintain your lifestyle.

Early resumption of Syria talks seen as remote

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The prospect of an early resumption of bilateral peace talks between Israel and Syria remains remote, says an Israeli specialist in Syrian affairs.

"I'm not optimistic that a formula can be found to bridge the positions of both sides," Moshe Maoz cautioned in an interview last week.

Theoretically, Israel and Syria are interested in resuming negotiations, which were suspended by the Israeli government in February 1996 after Syria failed to condemn a wave of Hamas and Islamic Jihad suicide bombings in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Ashdod.

Nevertheless, Syria's and Israel's respective positions remain far apart, observed Maoz, a Hebrew University professor of Islamic and Middle Eastern Studies, as well as director of the Harry S. Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace.

An impasse exists because Syrian President Hafez al-Assad wants talks to begin at the point they left off, while Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu insists that oral understandings reached by Israel and Syria are nonbinding.

"The chances that Syria will back down are slim, if not nil," warned Maoz, who has written a political biography about Assad and two books concerning Israel's adversarial relationship with Syria.

In his view, Assad will not sign a peace treaty with Israel unless he can reclaim the Golan Heights, captured by the Israeli army during the 1967 Six Day War.

In statements since his election more than a year ago, Netanyahu has declared that while he is prepared to enter into talks with Syria "without preconditions," the Golan, for strategic reasons, must remain in Israeli hands.

Israel has begun to modify Golan policy

"Netanyahu wants to deal with Syria on his own terms: to give the minimum and get the maximum," said Maoz, a member of a committee which advised the late Yitzhak Rabin on Arab-Israel affairs.

Assad, on the other hand, won't "sit quietly" unless the Golan reverts to Syrian sovereignty.

According to Maoz, Israel has begun to modify its policy with respect to a withdrawal from the Golan.

Within the past few weeks, he pointed out, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Foreign Minister David Levy have issued significant declarations. Mordechai has said that Israel should be prepared for territorial compromise in the interests of reaching an accord with Syria. Levy has acknowledged that a stable regional settlement without Syrian participation is unattainable.

Maoz said that Netanyahu's hardline approach may well be a bargaining ploy. But he expressed doubt whether Netanyahu could ever offer Syria tangible territorial concessions without forming a national unity government with the Labor party, headed by Ehud Barak.

Assad, he said, might have missed a golden opportunity to regain the Golan. He was basically suspicious of Rabin's reported offer to relinquish the Golan in exchange for a full-blown peace treaty. Besides, negotiations were still under way and a historic breakthrough was not imminent.

Maoz, here at the invitation of the Israeli Consulate, rejected the thesis that Assad is insincere regarding his desire for peace with Israel. "I don't buy this argument."

Assad, he said, is ready for a pragmatic accommodation encompassing mutual diplomatic relations, non-belligerency and a degree of normalization, but only if he regains the Golan and is assured of better relations with the United States.

If a political settlement eludes him, Assad may well opt for a war of attrition against Israeli forces on the Golan, similar to the one he launched in the aftermath of the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

He could also exert pressure on Israel by increasing his support for Hezbollah, which is locked in an increasingly costly mini war with Israel in southern Lebanon.

As a result, Israeli casualties there, which have reached record levels this year, would almost certainly rise.

Citing another scenario, Maoz speculated that Syria, in a blitzkrieg, might try to grab a slice of land on the Golan before Israel could properly respond. "Many analysts think this is in the cards, but I'm not so sure." Syria, he noted, has never gone to war without an Arab ally.

In the absence of armed conflict, he added, Assad will hew to the diplomatic track. "Assad has definite strengths as a negotiator. He is skilful, tough, cool and a devious tactician with an exquisite sense of timing. He learns from his mistakes and doesn't give up on his principles."

In Rabin, he said, Assad more or less met his match. But Rabin's protege and successor, Barak, is equally capable of negotiating with the wily Assad.

Rabbi Plaut celebrates birthday with book launch

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "I would come to listen to you read the telephone book." This tribute from an anonymous congregant was typical of the accolades heaped on Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut at Holy Blossom Temple as he accepted an award named in his honor.

At the same time, he celebrated his 85th birthday and launched his new book, More Unfinished Business, a sequel to his earlier book, Unfinished Business.

The title sparked a comment from Rabbi Dow Marmur, his successor, that in 10 years Rabbi Plaut will publish another volume in the series Even More Unfinished Business and a rejoinder from Rabbi Plaut that as long as life goes on there is always unfinished business.

"This book is a must read for those who are aging and want to remain active," said George Meadows, University of Toronto Press president and publisher.

A large crowd of friends and temple members watched as Rabbi Plaut cut the cake at the birthday party, his wife of 59 years, Elizabeth, at his side.

"This is a book of judgments, mostly about myself, some successes and a number of failures, nothing more, nothing less," he said.

"It may surprise you to read what I thought about my faith in God."

What surprised him, he said, was how different it is to pray in a pew in the congregation compared to praying from the podium when he was senior rabbi of the temple.

His magnum opus is a commentary on the five books of the Torah published worldwide, and a later commentary on the Haftorah. This led to light-hearted comments by Associate Rabbi John Moscowitz that no one who played tennis against him dared to defeat "the man who wrote the Torah and the Haftorah."

His career as a fighter for social justice, as a key leader of the Reform movement and as a staunch ally of Israel was outlined by Shira Herzog, a close friend.

Even when he disagreed with the policy of the Israel government on the fighting in Lebanon, he denounced the detractors of Israel, she said.

"Wisdom comes with age, and Rabbi Plaut grows even wiser as he ages."

Another chuckle came when Rabbi Marmur noted that Herzog had done the unmentionable – referred to the evening's guest as Gunther, twice.

The W. Gunther Plaut Humanitarian Award is to be presented every two years, for scholarship, leadership and commitment to human rights.

As its first winner, Rabbi Plaut was given a special bronze medallion designed by Sorel Etrog.

Excerpts from More Unfinished Business were read by Rabbi Plaut's daughter, Judith, his son, Rabbi Jonathan Plaut, and his daughter-in-law, Carole.

Rabbi Marmur thanked Henrietta Chesnie, the synagogue's first woman president, and Marilyn Farber for helping to arrange the evening.

United Church to aid Ukrainian Jewish couple

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A United Church minister is helping to raise funds for an elderly Jewish Ukrainian couple who can't get OHIP to pay their medical costs.

Rev. Caroline Miller, minister of Northlea United Church, has arranged use of the church where a benefit concert is to be held Nov. 25, in aid of Polia Ilvovski, 83, and her husband, Georgi, 91, whose plight was described in The CJN, Oct. 22.

"These people need help," she said of the Ilvovskis.

Several readers of The CJN have responded as well, and $230 has been turned over to the Ilvovskis.

The benefit concert will have performances by well-known singers and musicians, including Mila Filatova, a concert pianist, who is a daughter of Polia and Georgi Ilvovski, and is caring for them.

The Ilvovskis are in Canada on a minister's permit as they are considered medically inadmissible as landed immigrants. As such, they have not been eligible for OHIP, but Filatova has launched an appeal.

Northlea United Church is at 125 Brentcliffe Rd. (Laird Drive-Eglinton Avenue) and the concert begins at 7:30 p.m. All proceeds go to the Ilvovski family fund. Admission is $20 for seniors and Northlea members, and $25 for others.

Pragmatism seen as key to Rabin's motivation

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Yitzhak Rabin was motivated by pragmatic visions of an Israel in the future, says the founder and political director of Americans for Peace Now.

Rabin stared into the future and made three observations, Mark Rosenblum told a recent meeting at Temple Sinai sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

The first, and the worst case scenario from a military point of view, said Rosenblum, was that if Israel held onto Gaza and the West Bank, the majority of people would be Palestinian and would not want to live voluntarily in the Jewish state. "Israel would end up as a binational state racked with civil war. [He thought] that making peace with Arafat and the PLO would prevent this."

Rabin also saw in the future the emergence of a politically violent Hamas movement in Gaza that would be a mortal threat to Israel, said Rosenblum. "He wanted to try and make peace before Israel had to fight Islamic fundamentalism."

Rosenblum said Rabin also saw the plausibility of finding Arab hostile states that would be prepared to fight a war with Israel – a militant Islamic radical alliance on the eastern front.

"Because he saw these three things, he shook the hand of a man he loathed. He made this leap despite the difficulty he had in stomaching it. As a military man, he chose the better deal."

The collapse of the peace process, said Rosenblum, began with the assassin's bullet. "Not that re-election was guaranteed, but the core of Rabin's vision was correct. [With the assassination], Israel lost the most obvious person that could sell peace – a person that could sell a deal to the security hawks."

He said there is a 12 percent vacancy rate in all Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza and a new housing project does not have to be built until 2002.

"The real problem with the settlers are the desert diehards who are living to make sure that the Palestinians have no rights there. There are a modest number of militant Jews."

On a positive note, Rosenblum said that in the Arab world, "there are Palestinians who want democracy in their own society and are dovish in wanting to make peace with Israel. Our job is to help Israel grow democratic doves."

Dry Bones
THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY IS MEETING...
...AND THEY MAY CONDEMN ISRAELI POLICY!
SO?
THE UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY ALWAYS CONDEMNS ISRAELI POLICY
TRUE.
BUT THIS IS THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE JEWISH FEDERATIONS!

For the sake of klal Yisrael

On the occasion of the second yahrzeit of the murder of Yitzhak Rabin, one would have hoped to hear and to see evidence in Israel of a country looking inward, its people trying to hold together at the centre, facing each other in renewed understanding, refound trust and restated common purposes.

Would that it were so.

Two years after the unimaginable act, the country and the people are divided more than ever, it seems, into "camps." In political matters there are the left and the right; in religious matters there are the Orthodox, the non-Orthodox and the secular, to name but the obvious divisions. And in the "discourse" between the camps – if shouting and invective can be described as discourse – accusation and recrimination are the rule; mutuality and respect are the exception.

In the political arena, the adversariality is carried to a dangerous extreme. During a commemorative ceremony last week in honor of her brother, Rachel Rabin told an Israeli radio reporter that she felt "something terrible" was happening in Israel. She was referring to the revival of an odious conspiracy theory surrounding the assassination of the late prime minister promulgated by far-right ideologues, which implicated the late prime minister's own colleagues in his murder. On the other side of the spectrum, Uzi Landau, chair of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee, said the lesson of Rabin's assassination should have been "to see how we can make a truce in relations between the two parts of the nation." Instead, according to Landau, the left was embarking on "a new campaign of incitement and an ugly and undemocratic de-legitimization of the prime minister."

So deeply entrenched is the animosity toward Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on the part of some Labor Party members, that as of this writing, it is not known whether he will participate in a special memorial session in the Knesset dedicated to the late prime minister. (Our emphasis)

People are still picking at wounds that have not yet healed. Not surprisingly, the pain sears and the entire body politic is harmed.

The religious terrain is also strewn with land mines of intolerance between the Orthodox, the non-Orthodox and the secular. Of course, in the debate on the conversion bill lies the present danger and the fallout from the explosions is reaching the Diaspora.

A compromise to the conversion "crisis" was apparently recommended two weeks ago by the seven-member commission appointed by the prime minister and chaired by Ya'acov Ne'eman. Unfortunately, the proposal was rejected by the chief rabbinate. We hope that an acceptable resolution will be found during the current three-month cooling off period. Lately, there have been small but encouraging signs to that effect.

The Mizrachi movement has publicly supported the Ne'eman commission proposal, as have some of the established rabbinate in Israel, such as the chief rabbi of Haifa.

In the interim though, the level of rhetoric between the non-Orthodox and the Orthodox, and between the non-Orthodox and the government of Israel has not yet abated, especially in the United States where the core membership of the Conservative and the Reform movements is based.

For the sake of klal Yisrael, the inclusive peoplehood of Israel, we plead with all the "camps" to abandon rhetoric. We must all stop speaking about hatred and division and instead, speak of tolerance and unity.

Language of hate leads to acts of hatred. We have already seen the nightmare that lies at the end of that road and we must never, ever travel there again.

Ad insulted this Orthodox Jew

I found the advertisement for the New Israel Fund (CJN, Oct. 15) extremely insulting. As an Orthodox Jew, I take great issue with the very essence of their presentation. The Torah teaches that kindness and ahavat Yisrael are the secrets to our preservation. The New Israel fund advocates a "dynamic new partnership with Israel and the Diaspora," but their advertisement promotes the opposite reaction. The attempt to equate Jewish and Christian attitudes toward religion is appalling. Furthermore, the entire advertisement is a chillul HaShem (desecration of G-d's name) because it promotes sinat chinam (baseless hatred) against fellow Jews. The unwarranted and malicious attacks on the Orthodox community only serve to weaken their arguments and fundraising efforts.

Instead of vilifying and criticizing, we should find new ways to restore the collective soul of the Jewish people. We must, in the words of the prophet Jeremiah, "turn our hearts of stone into hearts of flesh," and thereby rekindle the life forces which make us Jewish.

The majority of Orthodox Jews in the Diaspora and in Israel support some forms of religious pluralism. True Torah observant Jews treat everyone with kindness, tolerance and respect. All Jews, regardless of their levels of observance of the Torah, would welcome "a new dynamic partnership" aimed at promoting Jewish continuity. The answers are found in our Torah and not in western standards of equality and justice which fall short of those Torah principles.

I know very little about the New Israel Fund, but based on their advertisement, they are not worthy of our support. The CJN should promote Jewish organizations which seek to unify the Jewish people in Canada, not further divide us. We must look for ways to promote ahavat Yisrael, not sinat chinam. The struggle for pluralism and religious freedom will never be achieved if we vilify our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora or in Israel. Baseless hatred destroyed the Jewish state in 70 CE. We must not allow it to destroy Israel today on the eve of its 50th anniversary.

Soap made of Shoah victims

I was greatly disturbed by an article (CJN, Oct. 9), in which Sol Littman and Prof. Jacques Kornberg are quoted as saying that there is no proof that human remains were used by the Nazis to make soap.

I have seen such soap with my own eyes. When I was a child in Poland in the 1950s, I clearly remember that my father brought home 15 to 20 pieces, which had been given to him for burial by a non-Jew. My father was a synagogue official (baal koreh) in Legnica, Lower Silesia. He was known in the family and in the community for the truth of his word. He was very sombre the day he brought the soap home and didn't want to talk much about it. He would not let me touch it, but he told me what it was. He explained that he was taking it for burial.

I can see the image of the soaps in my memory just as I have recalled them many times over the years. In my heart I know it was true. I resent reading that there is no evidence. The evidence is perhaps buried in the Jewish cemetery in Legnica, Poland.

Move in Montreal will not save rent

Re: Your article (CJN, Oct. 30) on the dispute over the move of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) in Montreal.

It would appear from a perusal of the FEDERATION CJA budget proposal for CJC-Q that CJC-Q would save $58,000 in rent it now pays towards the operating costs of Samuel Bronfman House. This is because FEDERATION CJA is offering to house CJC-Q free of any rent. If this move takes place as suggested, not one cent of the $58,000 will result in any savings to the Montreal or the national community. These expenses relate to continuing expenses such as building maintenance and contract items, heating, insurance and taxes. The expense of carrying the "free rent" now will come from the Montreal Jewish community.

Insofar as program dollars are concerned, the bulk of the reduction resulted from the 1991 Lithwick Report. This resulted in CJC across Canada giving up several of its services, which were turned back to the local federations. The budgets of all CJC regions were reduced to reflect this transfer of service responsibility. These services included Yiddish and Holocaust.

Yes, the CJC-Q program budget was cut back and they, like all other regions, learned how to do their work with less money. While I was the national treasurer during whose term of office most of these cutbacks took place, I do not know of a single project request for additional funding that was denied.

If there is any emphasis to be placed on this issue, I believe that the decision has to result from process. It is unrealistic for FEDERATION CJA or CJC-Q to expect the national CJC to complete a study of the ramifications of such a move, receive reassurances from both FEDERATION CJA and CJF (the national funding body) within the six-week period requested.

Oldest synagogue in the United States

In the article about the Charleston, S.C. synagogue (CJN, Oct. 15), you said the oldest synagogue in the United States is in New York City. Other sources refer to the Touro Synagogue in Newport, R.I., as the oldest. It was built in 1763.

Proposing a code of conduct for peace negotiations

By DAVID H. GOLDBERG

In his Sept. 29 speech at the opening of the 52nd session of the United Nations General Assembly, Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy proposed five principles of interaction between Israelis and Arabs that collectively constitute a "code of conduct" for peacemaking.

The purpose of this code of conduct, Levy explained, is to "facilitate uninterrupted negotiations and crisis management, and to create an atmosphere of dialogue. This code must meet the sensitivities and needs of both sides. We believe that the adoption of [this code of conduct] will allow us to overcome the present crisis and help in preventing future ones as the negotiations proceed. These rules of the game will also contribute to renewed trust between the leaders and greater confidence and understanding between the people."

The core principle of this code of conduct (in Levy's words) are: the rejection of violence as a means for achieving political goals; preservation of the framework of direct negotiations and agreement to refrain from attempts to transfer the disputes and the negotiations onto the international stage; institutionalizing permanent channels of communication, including in times of crisis; cessation of incitement, of the call to violence and jihad, and their replacement by the language of reconciliation and mutual respect; the advancement and encouragement of normalization and support for regional activities.

It is important to note that each of these principles is already addressed in the series of agreements that together make up the Oslo accords.

For instance, in his exchange of letters with Yitzhak Rabin on Sept. 9, 1993, Chairman Yasser Arafat declared. "The PLO commits itself to the Middle East peace process, and to a peaceful resolution of the conflict between the two sides, and declares that all outstanding issues relating to permanent status will be resolved through negotiations." Following from this commitment, the Palestinian leadership and Israel agreed, in the Olso Two Agreement of Sept. 28, 1995 (Article XXI), to establish a permanent mechanism of dispute resolution through direct bilateral communications. Nevertheless, from Israel's perspective, the Palestinian Authority (PA) has sought to circumvent this mechanism when disputes have arisen in negotiations, choosing instead, to appeal its case directly to foreign governments, media and the "court of international opinion."

With regard to the fourth principle of conduct noted above, i.e., the "cessation of incitement," the Gaza-Jericho Agreement of May 1994 (Article XXI) states: Israel and the PA "shall seek to foster mutual understanding and tolerance and shall accordingly abstain from incitement, including hateful propaganda against each other, and without derogating from the principle of freedom of expression, shall take legal measures to prevent such incitement by any organizations, groups or individuals within their jurisdiction." This commitment was reiterated in the Olso Agreement (Article XXII).

However, again from Israel's perspective, the conduct of high ranking Palestinian officials has not always been consistent with the commitment undertaken by both sides to cease using language likely to incite hatred and violence against the other. Arafat has frequently advocated jihad as a legitimate method for achieving political goals vis-a-vis Israel, and he has repeatedly avoided ruling out the Palestinian resort to terrorism and other forms of violence to express frustration over the negotiations. The infamous Palestine National Covenant has yet to be abrogated, despite repeated commitments by Arafat and the Palestinian Authority to fulfil this obligation. Palestinian officials and journalists have over time foisted a litany of wild accusations against Israelis — including allegedly infecting Palestinian children with the virus linked to AIDS — with nary a word of criticism (let alone apology) from Arafat. Finally in this regard, there has been no discernible effort on the part of the PA to incorporate an "educating for peace" program into the curriculum of schools in Gaza and the West Bank, or to impress upon average Palestinians the importance of institutionalized people-to-people contacts with their Israeli counterparts.

Admittedly, the Palestinians do have their share of grievances about the conduct of the negotiations with Israel since Oslo, especially regarding missed deadlines for implementing IDF redeployments and other elements of the Interim Agreement, settlement activity, and Israeli actions in Jerusalem. Without declaring from these serious issues, all of which must be addressed if there is to be final settlement between Israelis and Palestinians, it is necessary to place each of these grievances in proper perspective.

First, it is important to note that, for the most part, delays in meeting deadlines for IDF redeployment have been caused by security resulting from terrorist attacks. For instance, widespread popular anguish over the wave of Hamas and Islamic Jihad suicide bombings in the spring of 1996 forced the government of Shimon Peres to delay the talks over Hebron. Similarly, the Tel Aviv cafe bombing and the two multiple suicide bombings in Jerusalem earlier this year, along with widespread concern about the sincerity of the PA's determination to live up to its paramount commitment to fight terrorism, led the Netanyahu government to temporarily suspend negotiations toward implementing further redeployments (as well as the construction of a Palestinian airport and harbor in Gaza and a land-bridge connecting Gaza and the West Bank).

As for settlements: In the Sept. 13, 1993 Declaration of Principles (Article V:2-3), Israel and the Palestinians agreed to defer talks about Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza until the permanent-status phase of the negotiations. Pursuant to the Oslo Two Agreement (Article XI:3.C), all Jewish settlements were incorporated into "Area C," areas of the West Bank and Gaza still under exclusive Israeli control from which Israel agreed to undertake phased, partial redeployment "except for the issues [e.g., settlement] that will be negotiated in the permanent status negotiations." Put simply, there is nothing in the Oslo agreement that restricts Jewish settlement activity. Though the Rabin government did freeze funding for new settlements, this was never applied in practice to the construction of settlements in areas surrounding Jerusalem, nor did the Rabin and Peres governments restrict the expansion of existing settlements to accommodate natural growth.

The policy of "thickening" existing settlements has been continued by the current Israeli government. As Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu remarked: "Yitzhak Rabin himself said under no circumstances did Oslo 'preclude' the further expansion of existing settlements. And he was true to his word. Under his government, the existing settlements underwent an unprecedented expansion. I don't think you can expect me to do less." To this point Netanyahu has deferred decision on the construction of new settlements, despite intense pressure from his political supporters and members of his coalition government.

With regard to Jerusalem, it must be emphasized that there is nothing in the Oslo accords that restricts the right of Israel to build in any part of the city. To be sure, the decisions to extend the Hasmonean tunnel in the Old City, and begin construction at Har Choma without first consulting with the PA, have been widely criticized as violations by Israel of the spirit of the Oslo agreements. However, even Israeli critics of the current government, many of whom question the timing and political wisdom of these moves, nevertheless insist that such actions are not inconsistent with the letter of the Oslo agreements. Furthermore, it has been pointed out that the PA did have recourse to have its grievances over controversial Israeli actions in Jerusalem placed before the bilateral dispute-resolution mechanism established in the Oslo Agreement. Instead, the PA chose to circumvent this process and take its complaints over Har Choma directly to the United Nations General Assembly, which, sitting in extraordinary 'special emergency session,' passed resolutions that were, in the minds of critics and supporters of the Netanyahu government alike, both disproportionately critical of Israel and counterproductive.

The "handshake" on the White House lawn introduced the Oslo accords to a hopeful world. Four years later, two years after the assassination of one of the champions of the accords, Yitzhak Rabin, that hope has been all but spent. To revive a sense of hope in the possibility of peace, a code of conduct has been proposed for the parties. [RNS/Reuters]

The PA's apparent manipulation of the General Assembly and international opinion over the Har Choma dispute, as much as anything else, gave rise to discussion in Israeli circles about the need to codify the "rules" guiding the conduct of Arab-Israeli negotiations.

The fact that it is now necessary to consider instituting a formal code of conduct reflects the frustration the majority on both sides — Israelis and Arabs alike — feel over the way in which the quality of diplomatic intercourse has deteriorated since the promising start at Oslo only four years ago.

From the Palestinian perspective, an indication of Israeli compliance with this protocol will be an end to delays in concrete steps toward implementing the Interim Agreement. From Israel's perspective, early tests of the Palestinian Authority's interest in "buying into" the code of conduct include its readiness to take meaningful steps to resume security cooperation and coordination with Israel in combating terrorism, and end the renewed campaign to isolate and discredit Israel at the United Nations and other international forms.

Opinions

Show me how you live

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Some years ago, I volunteered as a docent at the Museum of Anthropology on the campus of the University of British Columbia. The museum is renown for its collection of Aboriginal art and artifacts. Its giant totem poles dominate the main room and scores of school children visit its galleries daily. It has also taken the lead in making both established and aspiring native artists an integral part of its operation.

I was guiding a group of school children through its collection of masks when one student approached me. "Are all the Indians dead?" he inquired. I was pleased to tell him that indeed no, the Indians were alive and still creating art of great power and beauty, as well as reasserting their own culture and traditions and ownership of their land.

I often think about that question. Let's reframe it. You take your children from North American Jewish communities every year to Poland and Israel. It is a natural question then to ask, "Are all the other Jews in the world dead?"

In Canada, our community is composed of Jewish immigrants from many countries and every continent. That is surely true in other communities.

Sad but true, then, that while we know intellectually that there are thriving Jewish communities here and elsewhere, we tend to teach our children that only in Israel can Jews flourish. Worse, we teach them implicitly or explicitly that only in Israel can one find authenticity of Jewish life.

I offer an extreme example of this tendency from my own life. My conversion was done by a Conservative rabbi. The status of my children is currently a matter of dispute in Israel (to put it mildly). They are not recognized as Jews by the Chabad movement. My father-in-law of blessed memory loved his grandchildren. Yet year after year he sent donations to the Lubavitch movement because he felt that they exemplified all the Jewish virtues of observance that he felt he lacked.

We tried to explain to him that the good he did as a caring father and grandfather and the good deeds for which he is remembered by his family were all he needed to be a good, indeed a wonderful Jew. We wanted to convince him that he had lived a Jewish life for 90 years. But he could not accept this, even though he knew his donations went to an organization whose actions denied the Jewishness of his own grandchildren.

Just as I do not believe that Jewish life outside Israel is inauthentic, I understand that a visit to Poland would teach anyone that the Jews are all dead. I fear, however, that by acting as if our own observance of Jewish tradition is somehow flawed as long as we insist on living outside Israel, we also teach that what we do here does not matter, that we are a dying breed, and only the Jews of Israel are alive.

No. We outside of Israel have our scholars; they have theirs. Remember the two Talmuds?

Therefore, I offer a radical suggestion for our youth movements with their flourishing travel business, to consider.

Next summer instead of visiting Poland and Israel, why not begin a vigorous attempt to initiate exchanges of Jewish youth from Canada with the following communities: Argentina (upwards of 250,000 Jews); Mexico; England; France. Well, you get the idea. Most are large communities made up of a variety of Jews – just like us. Why make them sound as if they belonged in a museum? Or even worse, why make them invisible by not talking about them at all, except in the past tense?

You could even make the exchange with France a good chance to practise French!

This is a serious proposal. We must begin to view our Jewish lives as authentic. This may horrify those who are comfortable with Israel as a surrogate for their own Jewish living, but so be it. There are living Jews in these countries, our brothers and sisters. Their communities have their difficulties, as do ours, but they work hard at living Jewishly. Ask them to teach us how they live, what their dreams and visions of Judaism are.

Our children will not, in one fell swoop, abandon the respect and connection we hope will endure between our communities and Israel. But despite predictions of the demise of Diaspora Jews, news of their death has been greatly exaggerated.

I was happy, at the end of my tour as a docent, to see classes meeting young First Nations people working at the museum, explaining their lives to children who would never again ask if all the Indians were dead (despite the best efforts of the United States Army and the Canadian bureaucracy).

They are alive and thriving. So are Jews all over the western world. Let our children learn how they live and let us teach them about our lives. It can only be good for the Jews.

Sherman in the top rank

By Shel Krakofsky in London

At a time when the most popular poetry consists of cheap postcards of shorthand thinking, political rant, street talk and the bizarre cant of performance poets, it is refreshing and exciting to read Clusters, the newest poetry collection (his eighth) by Kenneth Sherman from Mosaic Press.

In the poem, In Memoriam: Adele Wiseman, Sherman talks about "preparing myself/ for a life on the line." A teacher of literature and creative writing at York University and Sheridan College, he is the author of Void and Voice: Essays on Historical and Literary Currents, also published this year by Mosaic.

Sherman's is a wise, controlled and believable voice, modulated by emotions that are genuine, not forced. His language is taut, clear, confident and precise, which leads to his characteristic accessibility, wonder and often – surprise. All of this without any superficial veneer.

It has been said that when a poem stops, the reader ought to go through the windshield. This is not Sherman's practical intention but is sometimes his literary and healthy equivalent.

The title poem of Clusters is an elegant 24-part work that delves into the fiction and reality of a lengthy marriage sustained and lost, lost and sustained. "And now," he concludes, "we have all this finishing to begin."

With the two books published this year, Sherman confirms his place in the top rank of creative writers. He is a gifted, significant and important Canadian poet. What follows are two of his poems, both dealing with Shabbat as an outsider, one in a Jewish milieu, the other not. The first is from an earlier Jewish Book Prize collection, Jackson's Point, the second from Clusters.

Friday-Night Services

Walking home down main street,
I catch my reflection in the window of the hall where the local toughs

drink and dance.
I am startled to see that I have forgotten to remove my skullcap.

Gaberdine

Sabbath-breaker, I pass them in my car as they walk beneath a sweet suburban sun.
Aside from storefront English
one might think that this is Lublin, circa 1936, before the grave events burned in us those questions that seem to make their dress irrelevant:
the aristocrat's fur hat proclaiming man-in-God is noble, the earlocks reaching out like a stem's searching tendril, knee-high, page-white stockings and the shining gaberdine – deep beyond the darkest ink.

There is that student in the tale,
the one desiring grace,
who sought his Master not for Torah but to watch him tie his shoelace!
Gesture. Nuance. Revelation
in the movement of a hand.
Layers in the simplest narrative.

That world has vanished,
and these, the remnant,
anachronistic yet ecstatic, carry the word upon their lips while we who have been given the illusion of direction stay lost in the flow of traffic.

Nobody pays attention

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Most people know that some news gets prime billing and other events are practically hidden from public knowledge. One example of this has bothered me for some time. I am referring to the news from Algeria, where large numbers of people are killed month after month. But radio and television, which are the prime news purveyors in North America (many people have given up reading newspapers altogether), make only an occasional mention of violence in Algeria and sometimes even mention a number, but it is done so quickly and so superficially that the message is obvious: "This really doesn't matter."

On the other hand, when it comes to Israel, even the smallest disturbance receives extensive treatment, and in addition there will be editorial comments to make it clear that in the opinion of the network or particular station, this is something everyone ought to know. I am of two minds about this: on the one hand, I am glad that Israel is considered important, but on the other, there is the nagging suspicion that such news is very often negative and that the positive aspects of Israel's existence continue to be under-reported.

But Algeria? A lot of people don't even quite know where the country is located, and besides, what impact does it have on Canada? Surprisingly, it does. And here's why.

I found the following information in one of the news services that I use on the Internet: "The United Nations High Commission for Refugees today warned against the hasty deportation of rejected Algerian asylum seekers in the midst of an upsurge of violence in Algeria."

As of late September, some 6,000 applicants for asylum had surfaced in Europe, the United States and Canada. Only a very small percentage were approved for acceptance and those who are returned to Algeria face almost certain death or, at the minimum, serious reprisals.

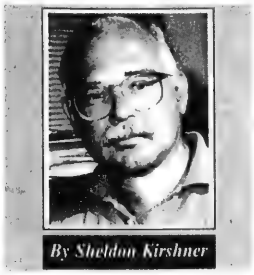
The whole refugee protection system has one principle that must be scrupulously observed: each case must be investigated on its own merits. What looks prima facie to be an open and shut case often turns out on closer examination to be all but that. After all, returning a person may expose him or her to severe retribution at home, and the whole protection system is meant to prevent such occurrence.

I mention all this only to indicate that we too are affected, although in a way that is totally unknown to most people. What we need, to begin with, is a more extensive treatment by the media of the situation in Algeria. The problem certainly is extensive enough to warrant our attention.

In an uncomfortable way, this presumed lack of public interest has the foul odor of prejudice. What takes place in Europe is presumed to be of interest; what takes place in Asia and Africa (except for Israel and the Palestinians) is not. Draw your own conclusions why this is so.

The Kirshner File

Swiss dormant funds elude a family



By Sheldon Kirshner

In 1939, before his forced departure to Riga, Latvia, Abraham Hammersfeld, a Viennese Jewish textile merchant, revealed a closely-guarded secret to his favorite granddaughter, Renee Appel. Hammersfeld, who would perish during the Holocaust, disclosed he had a bank account in Switzerland.

Fifty-eight years on, Hammersfeld's children and grandchildren are still looking for his dormant account. It is one of thousands of unclaimed accounts which have transfixed the attention of the world in the past few years.

Much to her undying frustration, Appel, a resident of Toronto, no longer remembers the name of the bank, the account number or the address of the trustee who may well have handled her grandfather's affairs in Switzerland.

Lacking this vital data, Hammersfeld's descendants have been stymied in their search for his wealth. Indeed, exactly a year ago, his grandson, Hans, who also lives in Toronto, was officially informed by the Swiss Bankers Association's ombudsman that his supposed account had not been found by its member banks. Neither did he find his name on a list of dormant account holders published by the Swiss Bankers Association in July and in October.

Given the circumstances of the case, chances are that the money may never be recovered. "They're up against tremendous odds," observed Isabel Vincent, author of Hitler's Silent Partners: Swiss Banks, Nazi Gold and the Pursuit for Justice (Random House), the first Canadian book on the subject. "But I hope they find the assets. It would be the nicest ending to the story."

A year in the making, Hitler's Silent Partners puts a human face on what Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress, has described as the last chapter of the Holocaust.

But the book, one of the best of its kind, transcends the hard luck tale of a Jewish family caught up in the swirl of the German conquest of Europe. Rigorously researched and lucidly told, Hitler's Silent Partners assays the recurrent phenomenon of anti-Semitism; the Nazi takeover of Austria and its impact on the Jewish community; the profitable business ties between Switzerland and Germany during the war; the ambivalent role of the neutrals; the half-hearted attempts by the allies after 1945 to call the Swiss to account; and Switzerland's painful passage from denial to cooperation.

Vincent, 32, a general assignment reporter on the staff of The Globe and Mail, first became aware of Switzerland's commercial relationship with Nazi Germany in 1992 in Buenos Aires, when she was the newspaper's Latin America correspondent.

Covering the opening of Argentina's long-suppressed archives concerning Nazis who had escaped to Argentina after the war with the collusion of its leader, Juan Peron, Vincent came across reports of financial transfers from Swiss to German banks in Argentina.

Her appetite for the explosive topic whetted, Vincent, a Portuguese Canadian, finally tackled it with the help of a Southam Research Fellowship and the encouragement of media mogul Conrad Black. "It was a great journalistic challenge," said Vincent, who is drawn to complex stories and whose first systematic exposure to Holocaust studies was as a high school student in Toronto.

In compiling Hitler's Silent Partners — by turns a compassionate account of a family tragedy and a balanced report of a nation stained by scandal — Vincent travelled widely, read innumerable books, pored over countless documents and conducted some 60 interviews.

She is cautiously pleased with the book (which also has been published in German and French) and relieved that Hammersfeld's heirs , whom she met through Toronto lawyer Sergio Karas, "love" it. Vincent, too, is glad that Swiss journalists regard it as eminently fair and neither sensationalist nor an exercise in "Swiss bashing."

Considering its topicality, there are no startling bombshells in Hitler's Silent Partners, save for the disclosure that Gestapo agents were able to penetrate Jewish accounts in Swiss vaults. Apart from that intriguing bit of information,Vincent recites a familiar litany of facts, ranging from Switzerland's laundering of looted Nazi gold and its sale of munitions to Germany to Switzerland's current strategy for dealing with its critics.

Vincent comes down hard on the Swiss, castigating them for being neutral when it suited their interests and debunking the myth that Switzerland staved off a German invasion solely on the strength of its army and its alpine terrain.

But in her view, Switzerland is not the only country that needs to reassess its past. Neutrals like Sweden, Spain, Portugal, Turkey and Argentina also contributed to the German war effort, while the United States and its allies were remiss in failing to enforce postwar agreements relating to purloined gold in Switzerland's possession.

Vincent, though respectful of Edgar Bronfman's and U.S. Senator Alphonse D'Amato's work on behalf of Jews like Renee Appel, claims they should have consulted Swiss Jewish leaders before launching their campaign against Switzerland.

Vincent, however, saves her ultimate wrath for the Swiss, who, in her opinion, owe Jews and themselves two debts of honor. First, Switzerland must spare no effort to find the rightful heirs of dormant account holders and, second, Switzerland must "reclaim the truth" about its wartime past.

Switzerland's role as a neutral

Did Swiss banks help to prolong World War II? Adam LeBor, author of Hitler's Secret Bankers: The Myth of Swiss Neutrality During the Holocaust (Carol Publishing), believes so. "No other neutral country," he writes, "played as crucial a role in keeping the Nazi war machine rolling as Switzerland."

In this informative book, LeBor, a Times of London foreign correspondent, delves into the Faustian bargain Switzerland struck with Germany for profit and self-preservation. Swiss banks bought Nazi looted gold in exchange for hard currency, and this enabled Germany to purchase vital war material. It's not a new story, but LeBor sums it up rather well.

LeBor also deals with Allied and Axis intelligence-gathering rings in Switzerland and with German efforts to spread anti-Semitic ideas there. Interestingly enough, they did not receive a warm reception.

Nevertheless, as he points out in a chapter about its refugee policy, the Swiss government was convinced that a mass influx of Jewish refugees would disrupt financial relations with Germany.

Until it sealed its border in August 1942, an act denounced by Swiss churches, Switzerland admitted some 30,000 Jews. But by the same token, an equal number of Jewish refugees were turned away.

One Swiss official who bent the rules in the name of humanity was Paul Grueninger, a police officer who, in 1938, let in 3,600 Jews and altered their papers. He was suspended from his post, then dismissed. Le Bor recounts this shameful incident with compassion.

Policeman honored for saving Jews

By WALTER JELEN
Special to The CJN

Paul Grüninger is an unlikely hero, but he saved the lives of 3,000 Jews and now the city of Vienna has chosen to name a school in his honor.

Guest Voices

In 1938, the sudden Nazi invasion in March threatened the lives of Vienna's Jewish population with concentration camps or murder. There was little chance of escape because all borders were closed. A small number of Jews did manage to reach Switzerland, but they were returned to the frontier, according to the prevailing law.

More than 10 percent of Vienna's population was then Jewish. At the time of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, Vienna was the glittering capital of the multinational empire. It attracted the best and brightest, among them Jews such as Sigmund Freud and Gustav Mahler. In Vienna, Theodor Herzl wrote his prophetic book Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State).

Simon Wiesenthal, the Nazi hunter, has observed that "Vienna was, thanks to the Jews, a superpower in the arts and sciences."

There were 90 synagogues and prayer houses in Vienna at the time of the Nazi invasion.

Many desperate Jews killed themselves.

At that time, Polizeihauptmann Grüninger, then 48, was the ranking police officer in St. Gallen. There were a large number of refugees, because close to St. Gallen was a spot called Diepoldsau, from which there was a chance to reach Switzerland, then considered the paradise of hope.

Grüninger's task was to return 3,000 Jewish refugees to Germany.

Since, he knew what fate awaited them, however, Grüninger, "the police officer with the good heart," did not return the refugees to the German border. He even falsified some documents to keep them there for a time.

Then Heinrich Rothmund, chief of the Swiss Justice and Police Department arrived in St. Gallen. After Rothmund checked the documents, he immediately fired Grüninger for not fulfilling his duties. Grüninger also lost his pension and had to appear in court, where he was given a heavy fine.

Now the dismissed police officer had to find a job, but he had a hard time. He started as a laborer with a building firm, became a salesman, worked for a printer and sold wood.

Grüninger destroyed his career to help Jews. After the war, he was recognized to some degree for his efforts. Nahum Goldmann, who was then president of the World Jewish Congress, sent him a letter of thanks and a modest amount of money. The St. Gallen chapter of the League for Human Rights made Grüninger a honorary member. Grüninger never did get his pension back, but he received a letter of thanks from the highest authorities in St. Gallen. In it, the Registrungsrat thanked him for his acts of humanity. Grüninger, at 80, described this letter as a great joy of his life.

It took a long time for the city of Vienna to honor Grüninger, and just as long to launch a worldwide contest for the design of a monument to honor the memory of Vienna's 65,450 murdered Jews.

Walter Jelen lives in Toronto. He is a former correspondent for European newspapers.

Authors explore Jewish history

The Illustrated History Of The Jewish People* edited by Nicholas De Lange, essays by Jane S. Gerber, Oded Irshai, Ora Limor, Michael R. Marrus, Derek J. Penslar, Seth Schwartz, David Sorkin & Bernard Wasserstein (Key Porter Books, $50).

Chronicle Of Jewish History* by Sol Scharfstein (KTAV Publishing (paper)).

Understanding Jewish History* by Steven Bayne (KTAV Publishing, $24.95 (paper)).

An eminent historian has lamented that most of us spend too much time in the last 24 hours and too little in the last 4,000 years.

The books under review challenge this concern with the present as they take readers on an informative and stimulating journey into the Jewish past. They come at a propitious time when, more and more, many Jews are energetically rediscovering their roots, seeking links with the creative past and connections with the protean presence.

The articles in The Illustrated History of the Jewish People are models of compression, filled with telling and colorful detail and unhackneyed in subject matter and presentation. Each, by a well-known historian, focuses on aspects of the past that have particular relevance for our own time.

The first article, Beginnings chronicles the existence of Jews from their emergence as a distinct Middle Eastern people with their own highly developed religious life to the time of the revolt against the Romans. The author writes that until the 8th century BCE, it seems likely that the two divided Jewish kingdoms were not unlike the other small states of the Eastern Mediterranean. They had a chief national god, but worshiped other deities as well.

This began to change with the rise of 8th century prophets, and reached its culmination in the reign of King Josiah (639-609) when the Book of Deuteronomy was discovered or perhaps "caused to be written."

The Making of the Diaspora continues the story from the destruction of the Temple in the year 70 CE and the subsequent dispersion of Jews into a network of communities extending over a large part of the Roman and Persian empires. It deals with the Talmudic period and the rise of the Geonim, who became the leaders of Babylonian Jewry.

A Rejected People deals with the conversion of the Roman Empire to Christianity at the beginning of the fourth century and continues through the period of the Crusaders, the expulsion of Jews from European countries and the convulsions of the Reformation and counter-Reformation for Jewish communities.

A discussion of Jews under Muslim rule is the burden of My Heart is in the East. This era provided Jews with conditions that were encouraging enough to develop a rich cultural life, both religious and secular. "The outstanding achievements of this era "have hardly been equalled before or since."

Into The Modern World covers the long period from the 17th century to 1918 when Jews confronted the multiple problems of a modern society. It brought to fruition contradictory ideologies and ways of being a Jew, many of which continue to shape Jewish life today.

The Darkest Hour, To Be A Free Nation and The Age of Upheavals deal respectively with the Holocaust, Zionism and the creation of Israel, and the perplexities and decisions of a divided Jewish community in search of continuity. The 150 black-and-white and color illustrations are well chosen and of unfailing interest.

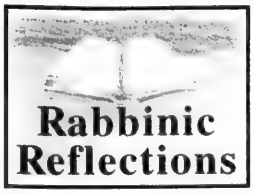
Chronicle of Jewish History is a splendid survey of our people from the patriarchs to the 21st century. The hundreds of color illustrations and helpful charts complement the simply written text. This paperbound volume should have a special meaning to young adults and university students.

Understanding Jewish History by Steven Bayme draws upon the author's 20 years of experience in adult education. Each of his 34 well written chapters contains both primary source materials, extensive historical content and analyses, as well as a bibliography.



Abraham a model of the Jewish hero

By RABBI ELIE KARFUNKEL

The world defines a hero or role model as a person to be looked up to and emulated. There are many different types of heroes. Movie stars, athletes and politicians are common examples of the heroes of our day. We are drawn to many of these people for what they have achieved in the public forum. In many ways, we attempt to live vicariously through them.

A Jewish hero is quite the opposite of the stereotypical hero described above. A Jewish hero doesn't need a publicist or an agent. The lesson of the Jewish hero manifests itself in this weeks Torah reading, Parshah Vayerah.

The parshah gives us the example of our forefather Abraham, who was the quintessential man of kindness and had an unbounded faith in the Lord.

Upon receiving a visit from three angels, Abraham said, "I will fetch a morsel of bread and you will refresh yourselves." (18:5) Abraham offered the angels only a small piece of bread. But once they stopped, he prepared a sumptuous meal for them. (18:8) Abraham always put the comfort of others before his own and concerned himself only with the welfare of his fellow man.

Put comfort of others first

Later in the parshah, when faced with the test of slaughtering his son, Abraham was willing to comply without question. Abraham preached to the world that the Lord was just and rational. What would the world say now? Is this a just Lord? These were thoughts that could have entered Abraham mind, yet he did not hesitate for an instant. He was willing and ready to do this seemingly illogical act, simply because it was commanded. This was pure devotion.

Abraham paved the way for future generations of Jews to continue the Jewish tradition of kindness to others and faith in G-d. It is the Jews who remain committed to the ideals of Abraham that ensure the continuity of the Jewish people and are the true Jewish heroes.

While they are not always recognized publicly and may not have achieved greatness according to the world's standards, it is these countless Jewish heroes that we are called upon to emulate and look up to. It is through them that we ourselves can learn how to be heroes for the next generation, thereby continuing in the path of our forefather Abraham.

Internet has information on genetic disorders

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

One of the areas in which the Internet excels is its ability to allow people with relatively specialized needs to exchange information and even forge virtual communities around the world. One example is the field of Jewish genetic disorders. Despite the fact that these disorders are relatively rare, the Internet can help you find information, advice and even empathy from others who are facing similar challenges.

I must emphasize very strongly that although you can find a wealth of information out there, the Internet must not be considered a substitute for trusted medical or rabbinic experts who are familiar with your particular circumstances. Also, pay close attention to the credentials of the authors of anything you read on the Web. Not every one is a reliable or accurate source of information.

Before looking at any other article, I highly recommend the Washington Post's Tricky Truths About Ethnicity and Genetics [http://search.washingtonpost.com/wp-srv/WPlate/1997-10/05/112l-100597-idx.html]. Reading about the various genetic diseases that Jews are prone to can be quite frightening. This excellent article by Robin Marantz Henig puts the research into perspective. It explains why certain ethnic groups, such as Jews, have been tested for genetic disorders and the ironies that have resulted. "The very groups that have often been stereotyped and stigmatized for the qualities that kept them separate for hundreds or sometimes thousands of years may now be subject to a new form of [genetic] prejudice."

Some of the most famous studies about Jews and genetic diseases looked at the occurrence of mutations of breast cancer genes among Ashkenazi women and found higher rates among Jewish women. [http://www.jcn18.com/newstand/wahrman/cancer.htm] and [http://www.usatoday.com/life/health/cancer/breast/lhcbr006.htm].

Scientists are constantly refining their research and in May, the National Cancer Institute released a report that said that although the breast cancer risk is higher among Ashkenazi women, it is lower than in previous studies [http://rex.nci.nih.gov/massmedia/press releases/jewishgene.html].

If you suspect that you may be a carrier of a genetic disorder, would you get screened? Rita Rubin writes in U.S. News and World Report that despite the fact that two family members were both treated for breast cancer, she has decided not to be tested [http://www.usnews.com/usnews/issue/GENEB2.HTM]. She feels that even if she tested positive, she wouldn't change her basic health strategy of regular self-examinations and mammograms.

The controversial question of genetic screening and its ethical and halachic implications is dealt with at length in several areas on the Internet. In his essay on Genetic Screening, North Dakota State University student Mike Wetzstein gives a good overview of this issue and explains some of Judaism's concerns with genetic screening [http://www.cc.ndsu.nodak.edu/instruct/mcclean/plsc431/students/mike.htm].

"The obligation with regard to procreation is not suspended simply because of the statistical probability that some children of the union may be deformed or abnormal."

Dr. Fred Rosner is a professor of medicine at Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York City. In Judaism, Genetic Screening and Genetic Therapy [http://www.ijme.org/Content/Transcripts/Rosner/genetics.html], he concludes genetic screening and therapy "are permissible in Judaism when used for the treatment, cure, or prevention of disease. Such genetic manipulation is not considered to be a violation of G-d's natural law but a legitimate implementation of the biblical mandate to heal."

Next week, I'll focus on some of the creative ways people are using to the Jewish Highway to spread their message, and continue our look at Jewish genetic resources on the Internet.

Mike Harris helps honor Righteous

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Yad Vashem chair Avner Shalev (right) bestowed Righteous Among the Nations status, posthumously, to Dutch Holocaust heroes Jacob and Klasiena Hamstra. Their children, Dorothy Kwantes (centre) and Hank Hamstra accepted the award. [Ron Csillag photo]

TORONTO — A choked-up Premier Mike Harris recalled his 1994 visit to the children's memorial at Yad Vashem, at a dinner last week honoring two Holocaust heroes.

"We were moved to tears by the memorial to the [1.5 million murdered] Jewish children," Harris, the guest of honor, told the audience of 500 at the dinner sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Harris said his son, aged nine at the time, was able "to grasp the horror and significance [of the Holocaust] and in some way, was able to deal with those, perhaps easier than did his mom and dad."

The lesson learned was important for members of his son's generation, "around the world, of all faiths."

The event paid posthumous tribute to Jacob and Klasiena Hamstra, a Dutch couple who hid a Jewish girl in their home during World War II.

"There have been few opportunities more emotional or important, to me than to be here to honor two of this century's most important models of courage," Harris said. "Their strength was a gift."

Yad Vashem chair Avner Shalev presented the Hamstras' son and daughter with the Righteous Among the Nations award bestowed on gentiles who risked their lives to rescue Jews during the Nazi era.

The teenaged girl who was rescued, Flora Vogel-Lirtzman, now a grandmother of eight, came from New York state to pay tribute to her saviors.

She recalled being hidden in bed with the couple's children to avoid being found during a raid by German soldiers. Klasiena Hamstra, she remembered, put a sign on the bedroom door, warning of diphtheria.

"They were like my family," Vogel-Lirtzman said tearfully.

The Hamstras came to Canada in 1950, and settled in Bradford, Ont. They both died in 1991.

Their daughter, Dorothy Kwantes, said young Flora was hidden in their home for two years, and helped with chores. She said her parents would have denied they were heroes.

Several of the Hamstras' grandchildren were in attendance.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu brought greetings in a specially prepared video.

Shalev presented Harris with a scroll making the premier an honorary trustee of Yad Vashem. Five cabinet ministers, including Attorney General Charles Harnick, were also in attendance.

Outside the Inn on the Park Hotel, about 35 protesters representing Tzedec, a Jewish social action coalition, staged a protest against Harris' presence, claiming the premier was an inappropriate guest of honor at a Jewish event.

The protesters cited the Tory government's deep cuts to education, social services, the elderly and housing.

"Mike Harris in not a righteous gentile!" they shouted to arriving guests.

Is Israel's democracy undergoing an ultra-Orthodox conversion to a theocracy?

As North American Jews, we are justifiably proud of Israel's democracy. We are quick to point out to our governments and friends that Israel is the only democracy in the entire Middle East.

But today that democracy is being threatened. Not only by external forces, but also from within. If Israel's religious right is allowed to have its way, both the democratic and Jewish character of the state are likely to be distorted beyond anything its founders could have imagined.

For years the Orthodox establishment has determined how Israelis could get married, divorced, and buried. Within today's fragile governing coalition, however, the religious parties wield disproportionate power and now seek still more influence over the daily lives of Israelis.

They are trying to undo recent Supreme Court rulings that grant some recognition to non-Orthodox forms of Judaism.They have also tried to pass the first laws in the state's history that would formally delegitimize Reform, Conservative, and Reconstructionist Judaism in Israel.

But any one group's ability to legislate its interpretation of the law and the will of God has the chilling echoes of theocracy. Is this the Israel that you would want to pass on to your children?

The New Israel Fund has played a leading role in the battle for religious tolerance and pluralism in Israel. Through a three-pronged strategy to promote these goals, we are providing support for advocacy, Jewish spiritual renewal, and dialogue among all streams of Judaism. Dozens of Israeli organizations working for religious freedom now receive grants from the New Israel Fund. In fact, it was our beneficiaries who won the very Supreme Court victories that the ultra-Orthodox now seek to overturn.

To mobilize North American Jews against religious extremism in Israel, we have provided rabbis with a resource guide on Judaism and the Jewish State. We have brought leading Israeli advocates of religious pluralism to audiences across North America. And, surrounded by TV cameras and reporters, we delivered thousands of petitions to Prime Minister Netanyahu urging him to withdraw his support for the proposed conversion law.

The New Israel Fund is one of the most dynamic partnerships today between Israel and the Diaspora. For further information about our work and a copy of our free brochure, "The Struggle for Pluralism and Religious Freedom in Israel," contact us at the numbers below.

NOVEMBER SENDS CAMPAIGN CLIMBING

Even though the colder weather signals winter is just around the corner, November is proving to be a hot month for UJA Federation's 1998 campaign.

Four days of Over the Top telethons, including one at the Promenade Shopping Centre, raised more than $200,000, bringing the 1998 campaign total to over $28 million. During the four day period, 200 volunteers contacted close to 1200 community members, many of whom never contributed to the campaign before.

To date nearly 23,000 UJA Federation supporters have pledged their gift to help Jews in need all over the world.

Brian Schacter, who co-chaired this year's York Region telethon at the Promenade with Fran Gitter, said many shoppers stopped to take notice of volunteers making calls from the mall. "We raised twice as much as we did last year," noted Schacter.

Many families came out to help raise funds at UJA Federation's Promenade Telethon. (Photo by Stephen Epstein)

Representatives from UJA Federation's recently opened York Region headquarters were also on hand to introduce themselves to the community and distribute information about activities, programs and services available to the area's growing Jewish community. "People were pleased to see more of a UJA presence north of Steeles," Schacter added.

The final campaign thrust – Days of Decision - begins on December 7 and continues until December 17. Days of Decision, which will close campaign 98, will include a final series of telethons, special events and exciting divisional programs.

IN Jewish ACTION

No one ever said growing up was easy. In fact, many adolescents find it difficult and confusing. Rae Levy was an angry, rebellious teen who had no self-confidence and a very bleak outlook. Her troubled life on a continuous slide, Rae felt she couldn't cope any longer. That is, until she went to the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre, (JDD), of Jewish Family and Child Service, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency. There she spent four years undergoing intense therapy - learning to like herself, and taking one day at a time. JDD provides treatment to young people, aged 11-17 with a wide range of emotional and/or behavioural problems.

NOT MY CHILD

Diagnosed at an early age with a learning disability, Rae found school extremely difficult. "I always felt no matter how hard I tried, my work was never good enough," she said. Rae felt alienated and thought by "having a rough and tough attitude" people would like her.

"Things became so intense we didn't know what to do," remembered Rae's mother Rosie. "I thought because we raised our children in a warm, loving home, this kind of violent behaviour didn't happen to people like us."

It was only at JDD that Rae was assessed as having an extreme case of high anxiety - which explained her emotional state. "Through art therapy and counseling, I was taught how to channel my energy into positive thoughts," recalled Rae. "JDD was a place where I could express myself without feeling threatened."

A BRIGHT FUTURE

At the end of her treatment, Rae's school grades dramatically improved, and her morale was lifted - so much so, she received the JDD Stan Lerner Award, for the most changed student both academically and socially. "JDD has taught me never to give up. There is a meaning to life."

Today Rae is in her second year at community college, and hopes to be an art therapist to help other children with special needs "see there is a light at the end of the tunnel."

The Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre provides day treatment programs focusing on education and counseling sessions with a team of experts. It's another example of UJA Federation funding in action.

UJA Federation's Sephardic connection

UJA Federation's Sephardic Network is up and running and steadily growing.

The Network, co-chaired by Messod Boussidan and Jacques Sayegh, has held several successful programs, including a mission to Morocco and Israel last spring. It has just published its third edition of the Kehilla newsletter, distributed to more than 2,500 people.

Leading members of Toronto's Sephardic community are working closely with members of UJA Federation's Community Cabinet, chaired by Les Klein and Dr. Harry Krakowsky, to increase awareness about UJA Federation.

Sephardic Network committee member Larry Berdugo has been involved with UJA Federation for the past ten years, but looks forward to fostering closer ties between Sepharadim and the broader Jewish community. "UJA Federation is an integral part of the Jewish community and serves all members of the community," stressed Berdugo. "We have to make people more aware of how they benefit from UJA Federation each and every day."

On December 1, the Network is sponsoring a program with Petah Tikvah Congregation, featuring Eli Eliezri from the American Joint Distribution Committee funded, in part, by UJA Federation. The JDC, among its other activities, provides food packages for poverty stricken Jews in countries around the world. Eliezri, who masterminded the rescue of Sarajevo Jewry, who are primarily Sephardic, also played a crucial role in Operation Solomon, which brought thousands of Ethiopian Jews to Israel during the 1980s.

The program begins at 8:00 p.m. at Petah Tikvah Congregation, 20 Danby Avenue. To reserve tickets call (416) 635-2883 ext. 107.

CHANUKA KICK-OFF FOR ISRAEL AT 50

Hundreds of Jewish organizations in the Greater Toronto Area have created a consortium to stage a year-long series of events for Israel's 50th anniversary next year.

The celebration begins on the first night of Chanuka, December 23, with a candle lighting at Queen's Park, where entertainment, sports and political personalities will join the Jewish community for the kick-off event. Similar candle lighting ceremonies will be taking place at the same time in Israel and around the world.

"Toronto is joining Philadelphia and Los Angeles in taking the North American lead to mark Israel's 50th anniversary," says Julia Koschitzky, Chair of the Israel at 50 Toronto consortium. "We will be working throughout the year with committees, beneficiary agencies and our consortium members to organize an unprecedented series of events that showcase Israel's accomplishments."

The major events include:

- The December 23 Chanuka candle lighting ceremony at Queen's Park
- A fashion show on March 8/98 at Yorkdale
- A gala Independence Day celebration on April 30/98 at the National Trade Centre, featuring a live link to Israel's spectacular birthday bash at the 50,000 seat stadium in Ramat Gan, a suburb of Tel Aviv
- The Israel Festival, May 24/98, highlighted by a community walk with up to 10,000 participants from City Hall to Ontario Place
- Israel Showcase at the Canadian National Exhibition, August 18 to September 6/98, with exhibits reflecting Israel's contributions to history, the arts and business. Nearly 2 million people are expected to visit the showcase.
- A closing ceremony on December 14/98

Among the most important projects already underway is Toronto Remembers, a unique book which will be published by McClelland & Stewart, detailing the most memorable experiences of Torontonians associated with Israel - whether they fought for the country's independence, lived through one of Israel's many historic events, worked there or just visited. Organizers are seeking stories and photos from Toronto residents to include in the book. Contributions of stories and photos, which will be added to the permanent collection of the Ontario Jewish Archives, must be submitted by November 21. "We want to highlight the personal and unusual stories that have so closely linked Torontonians to Israel during the last 50 years," says Toronto Remembers co-editor Bonnie Goldstein.

The candle lighting ceremony at Queen's

"Anyone with a touching story and photos about an Israel experience can share it in our book," adds co-editor Jackie Shulman.

For more details on Toronto Remembers, call (416) 635-2883 ext. 705, and for regular updates on the GTA's Israel at 50 program, check the UJA Federation web site: www.feduja.org.

FAREWELL TO A FIGHTER

Perla Arditti, long time UJA Federation volunteer and spirited advocate for the rights of the disabled, passed away suddenly on November 6 at age 38. Perla, who was diagnosed with Multiple Sclerosis in her early twenties, founded and coordinated a Jewish Family and Child Service program combining skills workshops, educational sessions, counselling, exercise and a Jewish component for people with MS and their families. "She was a fighter and an inspiration to us all and she will be greatly missed." - Florence Weinberger - JF&CS

Art with Heart

When you combine a teacher, a nurse, an accountant, an ad executive, a bookkeeper and a homemaker what emerges is a surprisingly talented team. In this case, it's Stoneworks & Company, a group of six Jewish artists who recently donated a collection of their work for a silent auction to help Jewish Women's Federation (JWF) raise awareness and funds for the fight against women abuse. The show produced over $5,000 which will be directed toward woman abuse programs at Jewish Family and Child Service, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency.

The exhibition "New Beginnings" focused on the strength of Jewish women and their struggle to build new lives following episodes of abuse. "We felt our exhibit would offer other women strength, courage and hope to move forward," remarked artist Edie Harlang.

"We thought getting involved with JWF would be a good entry into helping other women in the community," said artist Sandra Duba-Shubs. "We have been very fortunate in our lives, but many others haven't been as lucky."

Allen Gales, who purchased one of the sculptures, believes the issue of abuse affects the entire family - women, men and children. "I feel it is important to support this cause - and I received a beautiful piece of art in the process."

Each year, an estimated 450 women come to JF&CS for help. "Many women do not disclose their victimization right away," said Susan Maldoff, who chairs JWF's Woman Abuse committee. "They need to speak up and realize that they are not alone."

Jewish Campus Life 101

High school students from the Greater Toronto Area will get a sneak peek at Jewish life on university campuses across Ontario next month.

Attendance is free and teens are encouraged to bring their parents to the Jewish Life On Campus information session and seminar, November 26, 7:00 – 9:00 p.m., at Thornhill Community Centre, 7755 Bayview Avenue (corner of John St.). The evening, sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, UJA Federation, and Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, will feature representatives from 14 post secondary institutions, including Brandeis and Israeli universities.

Seminar workshops will also be conducted to answer specific inquiries and to discuss issues affecting Jewish students. Seminar topics include Jewish Studies Programs, Financial Aid, Doing Jewish on Campus, and How to Survive on Campus: Support Systems from Students and Parents.

UJA Federation's Vice-President of Jewish Continuity, Lorraine Sandler, says the Thornhill venue is ideal because of the high number of teens living in the area. "This is a great opportunity for students to find out how to stay in touch with their Jewish identity."

Jennifer Turack, Director of Community Services and Youth Activities for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, says the timing of the program is perfect. "Kids will be making their decisions about which university to go to by December," she explains, "so they need the information now."

Young Judaea in 'big league' of youth programming

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Young Judaea, the largest Zionist youth movement in Canada, recently celebrated its 80th anniversary with a reunion that drew several generations.

Some 100 people sang, danced, schmoozed, fressed and reminisced with old friends. Many participants had attended summer camps across the country associated with Young Judaea – Shalom and Solelim in Ontario, Kinneret and Biluim Canada in Quebec, Kadimah in Nova Scotia and Hatikvah in British Columbia.

Risa Epstein, executive director of Young Judaea, announced that in conjunction with the Canada Israel Experience Centre (CIEC) Young Judaea had become "the largest purveyor of high school programs" for Israel. "It puts us in the big league," she said.

As part of its summer Israel program, Young Judaea with CIEC will be adding two additional groups to Israel targeting unaffiliated high-school students, Ryan Hass, Young Judaea national shaliach, told The CJN. "We really want to get a lot of high school students to Israel."

The Kesher program, a newly instituted three-month program for students who have recently finished high school – it is jointly run with the CIEC – is particularly popular among high school students on the semester program, Hass said.

In his speech, he gave an overview of Young Judaea's national activities across the country, noting that some new programs would soon be starting up, including a bi-weekly youth group in Kitchener/Waterloo and a monthly group in the High Park area in the west end of Toronto.

Young Judaea also does outreach to small communities, including those in Moncton, Halifax, St. John and Prince Edward Island.

In St. John, which has approximately 25 Jewish families, Young Judaea runs a group for four to six children, Hass said. "If we don't do it, they won't get any [Zionist] youth movement experience."

He said Young Judaea – its monthly program in Vancouver is up and running this year – is very active in western Canada. He noted that some 352 campers attend Camp Hatikvah, with 100 of them coming from Calgary, and he added that approximately 70 to 80 percent of the Jewish children in Edmonton ages eight to 13 attend Young Judaea youth groups.

Hass also said a new youth leadership training program run by Young Judaea with a grant from the continuity committee of UJA Federation would be starting this month. Participants, who can come from any Jewish youth organization, would get a certificate in Judaic programming.

The reunion was an opportunity for Young Judaea to honor Helen Glazer for her many years of service. Glazer, an administrative worker who has been working for the organization for close to 30 years, was given two tickets to Israel.

A longtime volunteer who was active in Young Judaea in the '30s, Glazer said she was thrilled to receive the gift, which was a complete surprise to her. She said she and her husband plan to visit her son and his family in Jerusalem in the spring.

Irit Waidergoron, the Israeli consul to Toronto, brought greetings from the government of Israel. The activities and programs sponsored by young Judaea "strengthen the bond between Israel and Canada," she said. "We thank you for your wonderful work."

Other speakers included Vivian Sharon, who represented Hadassah-WIZO, the parent arm of Young Judaea, and Lenny Baranek of the adult committee. Also on hand for the festivities was author Shlomo Perel – the film Europa Europa is based on his life. His visit to Toronto for Holocaust Education week was sponsored by Young Judaea.

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR
JIAS Toronto is the local service arm of JIAS Canada, a 75 year-old agency whose mandate is to resettle and integrate Jewish immigrants in Canada. The Executive Director ensures that the mandate and policies of the Board of Directors are implemented effectively, in keeping with the Jewish value of "welcoming the stranger in our midst".
Success will depend on your ability to create, implement and maintain programs and services which reflect immigrant and community needs, provide leadership to a staff of caseworkers, program coordinators, educators and support personnel; and work closely with lay committees, community and government policy makers/funders and partner service agencies.
Your background includes a combination of post-graduate education in social services or related fields; success in organizational planning and development; senior management experience; and knowledge of immigrant needs and issues.

"Just Between Us"

סופו של מיתוס:

מיהו סופר הילדים הנמכר ביותר בעולם כיום? ומה ספר הילדים שלו הנמכר ביותר (יותר משמונה מליון עותקים עד כה) ? רמז: הוא בסביבה. הזוכה המאושר(ת) - כרגיל, יזכו בפרס. את התשובות אנא שילחו לפקס 416-633-65577.

Kohanim welcome new Torah scroll to BAYT

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Grey skies and the threat of rain couldn't dampen the enthusiasm of the crowd that recently accompanied the Torah presented to Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation (BAYT).

Guillaume and Rachel Friedman donated the Torah in memory of Guillaume's parents, Eliezer Gershon and Sarah. It will be used regularly in the shul's early Shabbat minyan, as well as the minyan for Grades 4 to 8, in which their son, Toronto physician Dr. Lazer Friedman, and grandchildren take part.

The Torah, accompanied by a drummer and over 100 men, women and children, was carried under a chupah from the home of the Friedmans' son, Lazer, to the shul. As it approached the synagogue, the older shul Torahs, carried by Kohanim, were brought out to the street in traditional fashion to greet the newcomer and escort it into the building.

Dr. Lazer Friedman carries the Torah his parents Guillaume and Rachel (beside him, right) donated to Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation. The Torah was dedicated in memory of Eliezer Gershon and Sarah Friedman. [Zephyr Studios photo]

In the sanctuary, children and adults watched Rabbi Baruch Taub, spiritual leader of BAYT, and Guillaume Friedman fill in the last letters, and scrambled to catch the candy thrown from all parts of the room. Richie Idells of the Nafshenu Orchestra provided musical accompaniment.

The dedication was a family affair, as son Michael sang the parts of the synagogue service before placing a Torah into the ark, and son Avromi acted as master of ceremonies.

Avromi remarked that just as Moses' face shone when he brought the tablets of stone down from Mount Sinai, so his parents faces glowed when Lazer brought the Torah from Israel to Canada.

Synagogue chair Jerry Tollinsky noted that Guillaume and Rachel had moved to the area from Montreal less than a year ago, "but have already woven their way into the heart of the kehilla."

Lazer Friedman, speaking on behalf of the family, said that his parents epitomized Torah in their lives, in how they raised their children and ran their home, and by their generosity.

He spoke of the grandparents for whom the Torah was dedicated, his grandfather, who was killed while a prisoner of the Nazis in northern France, and his grandmother, who gathered her four children after the war and made a new life for them in Canada.

Rabbi Taub gave a d'var Torah.

AN OPEN LETTER TO

The Prime Minister of Israel, Benjamin Netanyahu, and the leader of the Labor Party, Ehud Barak

The Board of Temple Emanu-El, a congregation of Reform Jews in Toronto, Canada, is gravely concerned over the legislation relating to religious councils and conversions soon to be considered by the Knesset.

Our congregation has demonstrated a deep and enduring commitment to the State of Israel. This commitment is spiritual; it is emotional; it is financial.

The strength of this commitment is rooted in the founding principles of Israel as home and sanctuary for any and all Jews, a State enriched by its democratic tradition and pluralistic ideals. Indeed, Israel's religious tolerance and diversity have distinguished Israel from the other nations in the region.

The contemplated legislation makes non-Orthodox Jews second-class citizens in their own land. It sends a clear and unequivocal message to diaspora Jews that some Jews are less welcome than others. This is painfully ironic for a nation created in the aftermath of the Holocaust to ensure that Jews will never again be persecuted or discriminated against by reason of their religious affiliations or beliefs. That this legislation is directed against non-Orthodox Jews, who have contributed so much to the lifeblood and continuing survival of the State of Israel, is especially distressing. Most Israeli Jews are not Orthodox. Therefore, legislation based on the wishes of a minority is not only undemocratic, but excludes the majority of Israeli Jews from fully practising their Judaism. It would be just as intolerable for Reform and Conservative Jews to impose their views on Orthodox Jews, or seek to undermine by legislation the legitimacy of Orthodox Jewry.

The time has come for you as Israel's political leaders to promote and enhance the country's egalitarian ideals, and to refrain from taking short-sighted and politically expedient courses of action.

We hope and pray that you will not act on behalf of one constituency at the expense of both the majority of Israel's population and the interests of the vast majority of Jews outside Israel.

Holocaust Education Week

Sephardim too fell victim to Nazi onslaught

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — A late addition to this year's Holocaust Education Week program provided an overview of a lesser-known aspect of the Holocaust.

Sarah Taieb-Carlen, professor of Sociology and Sephardi Studies at York University, spoke about Sephardi Communities and the Nazi Regime at a program sponsored by the Sephardic Educational Centre's (SEC) young adult chapter.

Rabbi Yehiel Benayon, spiritual leader of Magen David Sephardic Congregation, also spoke.

"I would be here and I would think it would be an occasion to come together if not a single Sephardic Jew perished in the Holocaust," said the rabbi.

"Simply that my brothers' and my sisters' blood flowed the way it did, that's enough of a reason for us to come together and commemorate this."

Most Sephardim at the time lived in the Middle East and North Africa, although there were enclaves in western and eastern Europe and the Balkans, noted Taieb-Carlen, a native of Tunisia.

"I think it's important for you to know that when the North African Jews heard about the extent of the catastrophe in Europe, many of them fasted for weeks and many men grew beards [as a sign of mourning]," she told the gathering of mostly young, Sephardi adults.

Her own father fasted every Thursday for the rest of his life to commemorate the Jews who died in Europe.

In Tunisia, a few hundred Jews died in Nazi bombings, Taieb-Carlen said. Jews faced quotas at schools, job loss and more limited food rationing than their non-Jewish counterparts. In the main cities, men aged 18 to 45 were recruited for forced labor.

Algerian Jews, who had their French citizenship revoked in 1940, faced similar discrimination, but unlike stateless Jews in other countries, were not deported, she said.

Sarah Taieb-Carlen

The Jews of the Middle East suffered "practically not at all except for the usual restrictions any world war would bring.

"God only knows what would have happened had the Germans indeed invaded the Middle East," said Taieb-Carlen, recalling British field marshal Bernard Montgomery's 1942 victory over German field marshal Erwin Rommel in Egypt, and the influence of a particularly vocal pro-Nazi mufti in Jerusalem.

In Europe, the Sephardi populations of Greece, Italy, France, Holland and Yugoslavia were among those most affected. Salonika was captured by the Germans in 1941, and most of its Jewish inhabitants lost their lives in 1943. Almost 13,000 Jews served in the Greek army, she noted.

In Bulgaria, Jews were protected by the government despite an alliance with Germany. Some 10,000 Bulgarian Jews, however, served in forced labor companies. The decline of Bulgaria's Jewish population to just over 5,000 in 1965 can be attributed primarily to a mass aliyah in 1948.

Similarly in Turkey, the Jewish population declined after the creation of the State of Israel.

Of the European Jews who died in the Holocaust, an unknown percentage were Sephardim. In France, for example, Bordeaux had a Sephardi community that predated the Spanish Inquisition, and Sephardi enclaves could be found in Avignon, Nimes and Carpentras, the site of one of the oldest Sephardi synagogues in Europe, noted Taieb-Carlen. Eighty-three thousand French Jews perished in the Holocaust.

'Pockets'

Yugoslavia also had "pockets" of Sephardim, and the bulk of the Sarajevo Jewish community was Sephardi. There were 55,000 Yugoslavian Jewish victims.

In Holland, over one-third of the Jewish population was Sephardi. Over 60 percent of the Dutch Jewish population was murdered, according to statistics cited.

Interestingly, 376 members of the Amsterdam Portuguese community were saved because they appeared so distinct from Ashkenazi Jews that their Jewishness was called into question, said Taieb-Carlen.

She ended by crediting the Algerian resistance, which was "essentially formed by Jews. No one doubts today that it is...the young Jewish members of the Algerian resistance who made possible the landing of the Allies in North Africa, thus contributing to the victory of the free world over the Nazis."

The program ended with a candlelighting ceremony with participants Mira Shemtov, Keren Sakal, Ruben Benquesus, Michael Benarroch, Esther Benquesus (president of Toronto's SEC chapter), Ygal Cohen and Jamie Cohen.

Also participating in the program were Yona Shemtov, co-chair of the SEC's education committee with Ygal Cohen, and Francesca David.

Swiss refugee policy slammed

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Heini Bornstein

TORONTO — Switzerland's once-sterling reputation "deserves" the black eye it has received over the banking debacle. But even more indicative of its wartime record was the way it treated Jewish refugees, says a Swiss-born Jewish activist.

Between 1933 and 1945, Switzerland admitted 28,000 Jews, less than 10 percent of all the refugees it took in. But virtually all the refugees it turned away were Jews fleeing the Nazis, according to Heini Bornstein, author of the recently published book Switzerland: A Wartime Island – Aid and Rescue Activities, 1939-1946.

"I'm less concerned about Swiss behavior in the financial and economic fields," says Bornstein, who was born in Basel and who's lived on an Israeli kibbutz since 1947. "My concern is much more about Swiss policy on refugees – the human aspect."

And it's not a pretty picture, added Bornstein, who was in Toronto last week for a series of speaking engagements, including at Holocaust Education Week.

Before and during World War II, Switzerland didn't have a refugee policy. "But it did have a policy on Jewish refugees, and it was against Jewish immigration," Bornstein noted.

One of those policies is a shocker: It was Switzerland's idea to stamp the passports of German Jews with a "J," and to include on them the first name "Israel" for Jewish men, and "Sarah" for Jewish women, an idea the Nazis accepted. The Swiss rationale, Bornstein said, was "Jews were not welcome."

Between 1933 and 1939, Nazi Germany permitted free Jewish emigration and 250,000 German Jews left. In that period, when severe anti-Jewish laws were enacted in the Reich, Switzerland took in just 8,000 Jews and rejected 40,000.

"When the Swiss president was asked why, he said the lifeboat was full. But the truth is, that was only as concerned the Jews."

In all, Switzerland admitted 300,000 wartime refugees, 100,000 of whom were foreign soldiers who had been wounded or had deserted, Bornstein says.

Included in the Jewish total were 2,000 children. The Red Cross had asked countries to take in 60,000 Jewish children.

Bornstein played an active role in this. As a leader of the Hashomer Hatzair youth movement in Switzerland during the war, he organized rescue activities by establishing a network of clandestine contacts, supplying food parcels, medicine, money and documents to underground Jewish movements.

Hundreds of Jews were brought to Swiss safety illegally, he pointed out. And to compound its dismal record on Jewish immigration, the government made things difficult for the 18,000-strong domestic Jewish community.

"They explained to the Jews that Swiss policy was in their interest: 'More Jews equals more anti-Semitism.' So [the local community] was told to keep quiet.

"This brought Swiss Jews a deep dilemma. They were Swiss citizens [but] expressed solidarity with Jews. There was a split in the [Jewish] leadership."

But more crucial, Bornstein pointed out, is that the Swiss government made the Jewish community financially responsible for all Jewish refugees, despite the fact that the government picked up the tab for all other refugees.

"The government said to the Jews: 'They are your brothers. Pay for them.'"

The community managed to raise 18 million francs, but it wasn't enough. It was only then the government allowed the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee to get involved.

As for the debacle over the seizure of Holocaust victims' dormant bank accounts, Bornstein makes no apologies for his native country. "But you have to understand Switzerland was surrounded by France, Austria, Italy and Germany. The danger of a German invasion was always imminent.

"Today, we know Germany never intended to invade Switzerland."

For Bornstein, it's "very difficult" to prove that Switzerland's role as the Nazis' banker prolonged the war. "But they were a factor in the strengthening of Germany's military, and in the supply and purchase of weapons."

The whole banking affair has triggered an increase in domestic anti-Semitism in Switzerland, he said, but the country is making an effort to shore up relations with Jews. His birthplace deserves the knock to its image, "and I'm a little bit sorry about that."

Nevertheless, world Jewry "has the right to demand this money. It's only a small answer to everything that happened during the war. Money can be refunded, but not human life."

Berlin decision day soon

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The winner of a much-awaited design competition for a national Holocaust memorial in Berlin will be chosen this week, The Canadian Jewish News has learned.

The nine finalists, selected from a pool of 19 designers, will give oral presentations on Nov. 14, and a final decision is expected to be made on the following day, said Ekkehard Klausa, a Berlin official in charge of Holocaust memorials in Germany's capital.

Klausa, here as a guest of Holocaust Education Week and the Goethe Institute, said the foundation of the planned memorial will be laid on Jan. 20, 1999, the 57th anniversary of the Wannsee Conference, which signalled the start of the systematic destruction of European Jewry.

Construction of the memorial, just south of the Brandenburg Gate and a few blocks from parliament, will be finished by the turn of the century, Klausa said in an interview last week.

The memorial, to be built on a 20,000-square-metre plot of land donated by the German government, will be dedicated only to Jewish victims of the Holocaust. There are plans to erect a separate memorial to gypsies.

Holocaust sculpture unveiled

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — The unveiling of Out of The Darkness, a Holocaust memorial sculpture by Toronto-based award-winning artist Irene Frolic, capped a moving Holocaust Education Week program held at Shaar Shalom Synagogue last week.

The 10-foot-high by 10-foot-wide sculpture located in the main-floor foyer of the synagogue is made mostly of sand-blasted and patinated glass and includes the poem We Remember Them.

Frolic, a child survivor of the Holocaust, was born in Poland in 1941 and came to Canada in 1948.

The program, co-sponsored by the synagogue and Canadian Young Judaea (CYJ), featured keynote speaker Shlomo Perel. A retired Israeli businessman, Perel spent four years of his youth masquerading as an Aryan in the Hitler Youth and the German Wehrmacht. His story of survival was made famous in the movie Europa, Europa, based on his memoirs. (Perel is the subject of an upcoming CJN column by Sheldon Kirshner.)

Capacity audience

The capacity audience, with every age group represented, fell completely silent at some of the more poignant and incredible parts of Perel's story.

Frolic, Alex Rosenberg, Bertha Sumner, David Rosenberg, Dana Bennie and Holocaust Education Week chair Howard Driman took part in a memorial candlelighting ceremony as Arna Cappe and Frank Myers read a partial list – over 120 names – of congregants' family members who perished in the Holocaust.

Thornlea Secondary School student Adee Bross read G-d Bless This Congregation, taken from the 1996 March of the Living handbook.

Amanda Brewes, a student at Associated Hebrew Schools, read Who Will Be Invited?, a reflection written by her father, Russell, after a family discussion about the guest list for her older sister's bat mitzvah.

"Only 50 years ago, my relatives were struck down in a country far from where I live, but the ripples have crossed time and distance to affect me today," she read. "How many joyous singing voices have been silenced? How many tear-filled eyes are missing, beaming their love for me? How many smiles have been darkened? The room will not be as bright in their absence."

Event chair Sam Chaim, a vice-president of the congregation, noted that 50 years post-Holocaust, "we are running out of time to learn from those who [lived through it]. Let us remember so that we may learn and teach future generations," he exhorted, noting the importance of fighting for the rights of all oppressed people, not just Jews.

Other participants included Rabbi Martin Berman, CYJ's executive director Risa Epstein, Shaar Shalom Brotherhood president John Glicksman, Michael Sone and Gary Segal, who recited K'El Maleh Rachamim and the Kaddish respectively. The sculpture was unveiled by survivor Sara Eker, child of survivor David Kestelman and grandchild of survivor David Adler.

Vancouver BB Hillel Foundation gets new leader

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

VANCOUVER — Gabriel Meranda, new executive director of the Vancouver B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation, could easily pass for one of the students he works with.

The 30-year-old Toronto native studied science at the University of Toronto before embarking on a career in the Jewish community. He spent several years coordinating the Israel Youth Program Centre and B'nai Brith Youth Organization in Montreal, then served as director of the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Western Ontario. In his own student days, Meranda was a local and regional leader of Habonim Dror.

In Vancouver, he replaced Rabbi Ken Kaufman, who is now working at the University of California, Davis.

"My hope in Vancouver," said Meranda in a news release, "is to foster a warm, welcoming and pluralistic atmosphere at Hillel and with the students in the Greater Vancouver area."

"Things are going very well," he said in a recent telephone interview. "We're getting more students involved every day. The place [Hillel House on the University of British Columbia (UBC) campus] is virtually packed every day with students studying, shmoozing, checking e-mail."

Hot lunch every Tuesday is "a mainstay."

Aside from the Vancouver campus' proximity to the mountains and the ocean, the existence of the Hillel facility is probably the most obvious difference between UBC, which has an estimated 1,000 Jewish students, and the University of Western Ontario, with three times that number.

"The [Hillel] space here is quite considerable," said Meranda. "At Western we just had our office. The level of enthusiasm is equal."

Hillel activities at UBC include speakers, coffee houses, contests and currently, Holocaust Awareness Week displays and lectures. Text study relating to everyday experiences, is in the planning stages.

Based at UBC

Although Meranda is based at UBC, where he works with two other staff members – program director Daniella Weber and office manager Lily Nechamkin, "technically all of B.C. is our jurisdiction."

Simon Fraser University, which had a successful Hillel start-up last year, is one hour from UBC, and offers Hebrew and Kabbalah classes. Meranda has been in contact with Jewish professors there to enlist their help as Hillel advisers.

He is also in touch with Jewish students at the University of Victoria as a resource person. Occasional joint programming between Victoria and Vancouver campuses is a possibility, he said, but frequent inter-campus programming is difficult because of the necessity of ferry or plane travel to reach Vancouver Island.

Meranda believes the campus professional's role is to act as an adviser and guide for students, cultivating their ideas and fostering leadership.

He also feels it's important "to establish Hillel as a community organization. I think we need to share resources and share people [in both directions]." He would like to see students take on a more active role, whether in terms of youth leadership within and outside of Hillel or on Hillel's adult board.

"If the community commits itself to nurturing the students, they'll want to ensure that the Hillel organization flourishes," he said. "In terms of continuity, I think it's very important. Building a strong leadership at Hillel means building a strong Jewish community now and in the future – and it's not just the Jewish community. Building leadership, period, [benefits the entire community]."

Meranda enjoys his work, he said. "Being able to impart anything a student can use is a satisfaction and a great thrill. I'm being myself, and getting students to see their potential. I think when it comes from the heart, you really enjoy it."

Montreal Campus planned

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A $23-million project to expand, renovate and integrate FEDERATION CJA and the YM-YWHA was unveiled recently.

It is not only the largest construction project ever undertaken by the Jewish community, but a concrete "message to ourselves, to our city, and to all Quebecers and Canadians alike that our future is here," FEDERATION CJA president Stanley Plotnick said at a press conference.

"It would be false modesty to claim that this moment and this project are anything less than historic."

The complex, known as the Jewish Community Centre Campus, will be made distinct in the neighborhood by such landscaping features as the repaving with stones of Cote Ste. Catherine Road, between Westbury and Mountain Sights avenues, and the installation of special light standards to form a common "plaza."

The project includes the Y's $15-million expansion and upgrade announced in July, for which $14.5 million has been raised after about eight months of private campaigning.

Plotnick said, in total, $16.5 million has been raised, mostly from prominent members of the Jewish community, and the rest from corporations. The community is counting on a combined grant of $5 million from the Quebec and federal governments and the city of Montreal, he said.

Plotnick said a letter last week from Robert Perreault, Quebec minister responsible for Montreal, "confirmed" that the province will "participate significantly," and that Ottawa and the city may also contribute.

He is confident the $23-million goal will be reached within 90 days. No funds are coming out of Combined Jewish Appeal, and the maintenance costs for the larger premises will come out of an endowment fund, not the regular operating budget.

Construction is expected to start in the spring and be completed late in 1999.

Highlights include the addition of 50,000 square feet of space in a new two-storey wing to be built where the parking lot is now behind Cummings House and attached to the Golden Age Association (GAA) building, and an indoor passage that will connect the entire complex from the new south end of the Y on Edouard Montpetit Avenue through the Saidye Bronfman Centre and, via a tunnel under Cote Ste. Catherine, onto Cummings House and the GAA.

Visitors will be able to move throughout the campus without ever being exposed to the elements or having to watch out for traffic. Plotnick admitted that such a linkage does heighten security concerns.

The "consolidation" of these organizations, all FEDERATION CJA agencies, under one roof is more than symbolic, he said. It will reduce overhead and make for a more efficient delivery of services.

The plans also call for the "potential" relocation of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), the Communauté Sépharade du Québec (CSQ) and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) into the expanded facilities.

CJC symposium explores Canada's social cohesion

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Participants were offered a thought-provoking look at where Canada stands in its struggle to achieve social cohesion, at a recent symposium presented by the law and social action committee of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), under the sponsorship of Multiculturalism Canada.

The session on Social Cohesion Through Social Justice at the Chateau Laurier Hotel in Ottawa drew over 100 people, including students, representatives of various interest groups and relevant government departments, as well as members of CJC.

In her keynote address, Hedy Fry, secretary of state for Multiculturalism and Status of Women, noted that it was "important today that we look at a framework of social justice." She emphasized that "in today's society, based on 30-second clips, everyone is looking for a simple answer to a complex problem. To say unity equals equality is too simplistic."

A panel including Dr. Elaine Todres, president of the Baycrest Centre Foundation; Prof. Rebecca Johnson and Prof. Thomas Kuttner, Faculty of Law, University of New Brunswick; and Prof. Will Kymlicka from the University of Ottawa's philosophy department, spoke of the Canadian government's record in human rights legislation, of the shift in focus from national to regional and public to private in dealing with many social issues and problems.

Speaker after speaker echoed Johnson's observation that "equality is not about sameness, but the importance of making distinctions."

In spite of the fact that many Canadians are unaware of Canada's multiculturalism policy or even skeptical about its success, Kymlicka said our record of successful integration of immigrants is second only to Australia's and that "we do a better job than the United States or France, which have both rejected the concept of multiculturalism."

John Hucker, secretary general of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, noted, "we have to expect some bumps on the road to equality, but conditions are definitely improving."

Hucker stressed that improved communication is vital to let the Canadian public know what the human rights commissions are doing.

A second panel dealing with how social justice advocacy groups can work together to promote social cohesion was chaired by Prof. Maureen Molot of Carleton University and included Rev. Eric Beresford, coordinator of Ethics and Interfaith Relations for the Anglican Church of Canada; Joan Grant-Cummings, president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, who asserted that "social justice, as fundamental to social cohesion, must include gender issues;" and Art Hagopian, vice-president of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council.

Hagopian summed up the mood of the symposium with his observation that, as we face increased government cutbacks, "it is timely and important that Canada's multicultural groups work together. One way to overcome unfairness and injustice is by building bridges between communities…Today's event is a good example of this type of cooperation."

Irving Rivers, Ottawa 'landmark,' dies at 74

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Irving Rivers, a prominent Ottawa retailer and community worker, died last week of a heart attack. He was 74.

His store, Irving Rivers, at the corner of the Byward Market and York streets, was a popular Byward Market landmark for 47 years.

His family commented that it was appropriate that Rivers died on his way to open his store after attending services at Beth Sholom synagogue, where he was the parnass.

It symbolized his attachment to "shul, family and the store – that was his whole life," according to his daughter, Ellen Osterer.

He was active in the Jewish community, she said. He was a past president at both Beth Sholom synagogue and the Jewish Community Centre (JCC), and was involved with the Jewish National Fund, Israel Bonds, Camp B'nai Brith, the Hillel Academy PTA and the JCC day camp.

"It was all part of what made him 'him,'" Osterer said. "It was like eating and breathing.

"He was a man who loved his family and his community more than anything," she said. "Everything he did was for the people and the community that he loved, not for the kovod."

Born in Ottawa, Rivers took over the store from his father and his brother in 1950. Osterer described how the store was stockpiled from floor to ceiling with merchandise.

"He didn't believe in wasting money for shelving. He used to say that if the merchandise was there, customers would buy it whether it was in a fancy box or not."

Rivers specialized in different, unusual lines of merchandise, "from workboots to funky patches," Osterer said.

Irving Rivers

While he was committed to the continuation of the Byward Market, he didn't believe that governments should step in and control what was happening there.

Sam Zunder, a former retailer in the market, was quoted in the obituary in the Ottawa Citizen as saying "He really believed in attracting people to the market, and he was on the side of the farmers. When we went to city hall, he always said the city should leave the market alone."

Rabbi Ely Braun, spiritual leader of Beth Sholom, called Rivers "a total original. Even though he was born in Ottawa, he was like the classic definition of a sabra – thorny on the outside and sweet on the inside."

He was very much respected, Rabbi Braun said. He didn't play games – he said what he thought to your face, but never behind your back. And he expected the truth in return."

Rivers was a surrogate father and grandfather to many in the city, Rabbi Braun said. "When my own children, who don't have grandparents here, needed one for a project, they went to him."

Rivers was a very private person, Rabbi Braun said, and "did much that no one will ever know about.

"He was an institution in the community. We will miss him. I will miss him."

Rabbi Braun and several members of the family noted that the funeral chapel was filled beyond capacity, with many waiting outside.

Rivers is survived by his wife Evelyn, daughters Ellen Osterer, Ilsa Kamen and Jacqui Vital, stepchildren Joanne Kalman and Sue Diamond and Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Toronto, brother Albert, sisters Thelma Steinman, Eileen Goldberg and Goldie Cantor, and 22 grandchildren.

CJN Chanukah Poetry Contest

The CJN announces its third annual Chanukah poetry contest.

Who can enter: Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their family.

There are three age categories for entrants: 1. Twelve years old and under; 2. Thirteen to 18 years old; 3. Eighteen years old and up.

How to enter: The poems must be about Chanukah; they cannot be longer than 40 lines. A maximum of one poem per entrant may be submitted. Please include your name, age, address and phone number with the poem.

We would prefer to receive typewritten poems if possible.

We will return poems if you send a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your poems to:
CJN Chanukah Poetry Contest, The Canadian Jewish News,
1500 Don Mills Road., Suite 205, North York, Ontario, M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Dec. 8, 1997.

Prizes: The judges will choose six poems to be published, two from each of the three categories, which in their opinion, most poetically and evocatively convey an aspect of the meaning of Chanukah. Each of the "winners" will also receive a cheque for $50.

Only six poems will be selected as "winners". Space permitting, we may publish other poems as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of "winning" depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: "Winning" entrants will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, Dec. 12, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning poems will be published in The CJN of Dec. 25, 1997. We look forward to receiving your poems. May the miracle of Chanukah and the magic of its light be reflected in your poems.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

Slave-labor survivor loses battle for lost wages

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Anna Heilman is bitter but resigned.

"I'm frankly very, very sad," the 68-year-old Auschwitz slave-labor survivor, told The CJN from her Ottawa home. "It's sad when your worst expectations are realized."

Heilman was referring to last week's ruling by a German court rejecting her claim for back wages for her war-era slave labor.

She was one of 21 elderly Jewish women who had launched a class-action civil suit against the German government, claiming they are owed compensation for their forced labor.

Heilman was the sole Canadian plaintiff. The others live in Israel, Germany and the United States.

The court upheld the German government's policy of rejecting compensation claims by former Nazi slave laborers.

The judges ruled that German law already provides compensation to victims of Nazi persecution, but excludes the payment of wages to victims of forced labor.

The ruling said the compensation the women have received has been sufficient, and that they are not entitled to more.

"I didn't expect anything else," a weary-sounding Heilman said of the court ruling. "But it's terrible. I'm sick about it."

The suit took five years to wind its way through the German courts.

All the plaintiffs had been forced to work at German chemical and munitions factories near Auschwitz.

The Warsaw-born Heilman said she received a one-lump restitution payment of about $3,000 in 1956 for "denial of freedom."

As a teenager, she was forced to work in the munitions factory at Auschwitz for two years. Her parents were gassed at neighboring Birkenau.

Anna Heilman

Heilman's sister, Esther Wajcblum, was one of four women publicly hanged at the camp for trying to blow up a crematorium.

Only one of the plaintiffs was awarded back wages. The court ordered an award of 15,000 marks (about $12,000) to a Polish woman who had immigrated to Israel in the late 1960s, too late to have filed for compensation under a 1953 German law.

The plaintiffs' lawyer said he would appeal the decision.

But Heilman says she's had enough.

"I'm so tired of it. We wanted to bury the past. Now, they are denying their culpability, and they'll continue to do it."

Heilman said the ruling will affect all the former slave laborers at the Auschwitz munitions plant, which was called Union.

There are at least eight Union survivors in Toronto, and one in Montreal.

Only one day before the court's ruling, the German government insisted that compensation demands for slave labor under the Nazi regime were no longer valid.

An estimated 12 million foreign slaves in occupied countries labored in Nazi factories.

Last Wednesday's ruling was a stinging defeat for the thousands of Holocaust survivors who worked under the Nazis' forced-labor system.

Jewish organizations estimate there are between 15,000 and 40,000 Holocaust survivors in Eastern Europe who have never received compensation.

German companies that used forced labor generally paid their salaries to the Nazi SS, which kept the money.

Most of those companies – including German industry giants such as Volkswagen, Daimler-Benz and Siemens – are still in business. None of them has made more than token payments to their former slave laborers.

The companies have argued that they paid the Nazi SS for the forced laborers they employed, and that any further compensation should come from the government.

Heilman said Jews should be a "bit more demanding" when it comes to claiming compensation from German companies that used slaves during the war.

250,000 Russian Jews. There are also sizable Russian-Jewish populations in Los Angeles and Chicago of roughly 60,000 and 40,000 respectively. Toronto's Russian-Jewish community is the fourth largest in North America and comprises about 18 percent of the city's Jewish population of about 170,000.

Their problems, for the most part, are typical of all new immigrants: lack of shelter, money, employment, English-language proficiency, social connections and know-how. No matter what their professional backgrounds may be, many find they must retrain for jobs in new fields.

"When they get on a plane in Moscow, they still have their professional status of doctor, lawyer, engineer," says Sophie Fischhoff, a veteran social worker at Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS). "This status is very important in Russia. But when they reach Toronto 12 hours later, they're nobodies and they have to get in a breadline with everyone else.

"Initially, there's a honeymoon period when they see this beautiful city. Then they begin asking questions: Where do I live? How about a job? I was a surgeon, I was a chief of a department, I'm ready to work for nothing, just to show you my work.

"But there are no jobs and it's hard even to get an appointment. They become disappointed and disillusioned, and the honeymoon is over. Those who were in the big professions end up working in bakeries. They clean houses. They do menial work."

According to Fischhoff, many new arrivals go through a lengthy period of grieving for the old life while becoming accultured to the new, a process that can last as long as 25 years, a full generation.

"Very few get back into their fields," she says. "The ones who succeed are the ones who change their fields. They get angry – they don't want to be on welfare forever – and they get a move on with their lives."

In Minsk, Alex Gurevich was a highly skilled process engineer, his wife Maina a piano teacher. When they arrived here with their teenaged son in 1990, they knew only a smattering of English between them. Assisted by the government, the Jewish community and some Canadian relatives, they settled into an apartment in the Lawrence-Dufferin area of North York. Within a week, he was pumping gas at a service station and she was tending the refreshment bar at a bowling alley.

Even after the couple significantly improved their language skills through an English course at George Brown College, Alex could not find anyone willing to hire him as an engineer. "Sometimes at the gas station, I felt desperate – no future, very little money, lots of work," he recalls. Assisted by an empathetic counsellor at a Canada Manpower Centre, he sent out hundreds of resumes.

Maina, who upgraded her music-teaching skills, soon encountered one important cultural difference between the land of her birth and the land of her future. Music students in Russia, she found, are far more devoted than their counterparts in Canada, for whom music is often just a hobby.

"There is a different mentality here than in Russia," she says, speaking of the cultural gulf in general, "and this is almost as big a problem as language."

Strangers in a strange land, the newcomers try to understand how Canadians think. Perplexed by Canadian society, they are challenged by the ordinary decisions and activities of daily life. What type of clothes should they buy? Where should they shop? What food should they put on the table? What is proper telephone etiquette? In Russia, they worked for the state and overtime was often forbidden; in Canada it is frequently encouraged.

The Gureviches are a success story: both eventually found work in their chosen fields and they recently purchased a home.

"The life in Russia was very difficult," says Maina. "What we got here in a very short period of time we could not have in Russia in our whole lives."

One factor that worked in their favor, they say, was their relative isolation from the Russian community. Unlike the Gureviches, however, many newcomers move into neighborhoods teeming with expatriate Russians, thus impeding their own goal of acculturation and integration into Canadian society.

Elia Voloh, who learned English in his native Moldova, where he worked as an electrical engineer, arrived with his wife Inna and 6-year-old son last summer. Assisted by a variety of social agencies, including the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society (JIAS), they moved into an apartment near Bathurst and Steeles, the heart of the Russian-Jewish "ghetto."

"We're still speaking Russian a lot, since we're in an apartment where most of the people speak Russian," he says. "My child goes outside and he speaks Russian with the kids outside. This is a problem, it seems to me."

Established 75 years ago to help all Jewish immigrants with resettlement in Canada, JIAS' chief client group in recent years has been the Russians. "Our main business is not necessarily financial – we're not a welfare office," says Perry Romberg, director of the Toronto JIAS office.

In essence, the Federation-affiliated organization offers a smorgasbord of essential resettlement services in conjunction with other agencies, including English courses, adjustment counselling, and assistance with employment and housing. JIAS also hosts parties on Jewish holidays and offers classes on Jewish subjects year-round.

Organizations like Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) and JF&CS also help the immigrants establish new lives in their chosen country. JF&CS, for instance, has cooperated with the North York Board of Education for the past three years to provide a joint outreach program in five North York schools, focusing on the initial transitional months. At one school, Rockford Elementary, young Russian-speaking newcomers make up nearly 50 percent of the enrolment, up from 24 percent only a year ago.

"Young people integrate more quickly than their parents," says Margaret Kata, the JF&CS social worker who coordinates the program. "The children have the advantage of being able to acquire a second language very fast. Often, we're able to see dramatic changes in a period of six months. After that, they're able to communicate very effectively and participate in all classroom activities."

Bearing the stressful burden of resettlement and all it entails, parents often rely upon their children as cultural interpreters. Meanwhile, they find that the parental discipline techniques acceptable in Russia don't apply here. Just as schools here are far less strict and authoritarian than in Russia, parents soon learn that they too must become more liberal and abandon the heavy-handed, punitive style of child-rearing that is the norm in Russia.

"The goal here is to work with these families and help them understand and find new ways of disciplining their kids," says Gordon Wolfe, executive director of JF&CS.

Reflecting the general population, the Russian-Jewish community has its share of social problems like alcoholism, child and wife abuse, deteriorating family relations, prolonged unemployment, poverty and the temptations of crime. The transplanted Russians, however, are generally averse to resolving their problems through counselling, says Fischhoff.

Social workers don't exist in Russia and one sees a psychiatrist "only if you have a mental illness – he is a doctor who gives you pills or puts you in a mental institution," she says. "People here can come in and talk for an hour to get in touch with their feelings. That's not something the Russians can do. It's a luxury they feel they can't afford."

The issue of Russian Jews and crime is a touchy subject – and one no communal official claims to know much about. "The ones connected to the mafia, they don't need financial assistance because the mafia has money," Fischhoff says. "Sure I've heard of cases of this one getting shot, that one disappearing, but these are not clients. How true these stories are, I don't know."

She does know, she continues, that "these people come with wonderful values and they're enriching our community."

Part two will appear next week.

JIAS celebrates its 75th with an audible buffet

By JOYCE SINGER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — The Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, was recently the place to be seen. But not heard.

We were there to listen. To appreciate. And most of all to celebrate our heritage together with the folks from the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, and their extraordinary musical guests, on the occasion of JIAS' 75th anniversary.

There were heartfelt speeches from both Sandy Atlin, president of JIAS and Joey Steiner president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Harvey Atkin, (filling in for Ralph Benmergui who had to bow out at the last minute), kept the show running smoothly, as master of ceremonies

The concert was an audible buffet, with glorious musical arrangements performed by violinist Mark Skazinetsky (Toronto Symphony Orchestra), pianist Marina Surgan (National Ballet), and outstanding cellist Igor Gefter (Julliard). Ben Steinberg's Ma Navu was a particular crowd pleaser, as was the poignant Sephardic splendor of Cantor Armand Amoyal.

"We were trying to show the people in attendance the diversity of our Jewish roots." says JIAS' Sandy Atlin.

"One of the ways that we celebrated," Atlin explains, "was by commissioning a special piece of music for the occasion, by renowned composer Yefim Adler, as a musical keepsake." A highlight of the evening was his lovely composition Jewish Dances.

There was a wonderful performance by the dynamic "Yiddish Diva" and award-winning triple-threat (singer/ actress/playwright) Theresa Tova, (Still The Night, ENG).

Tova has us in stitches one moment and in tears the next, as she belted out such favourites as Sheyne Vi Di Levone, Di Grine Kuzine, and a delightful Molly Picon medley, in both Yiddish and English.

Tova confides that " These concerts are extra, when people ask me to do it. I don't actively go out and search for it, but I love it. I'd like to make this my life."

The Gala event was attended by such notables as actress Marilyn Lightstone; Moses Znaimer, head of the CityMuchBravoSpace stations; Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, Temple Sinai; Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman, executive director of the Jewish Russian Centre; Cantor Benjamin Maissner, Holly Blossom Temple; and Charles Heller, musical director of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, and Lorna Jackson, the Mayor of Vaughan.

The evening was also a reminder that JIAS has been an integral part of our ever burgeoning Canadian-Jewish community. Since 1922, they have been helping the less fortunate among us, worldwide, to emigrate and settle across Canada.

The Toronto Chapter took this occasion to launch a special Community Heritage Book. In it, early Jewish Torontonians, and their descendants, recollect their emigration experiences and express their profound, collective gratitude towards the JIAS organization and its membership.

Albright seeks to resolve remaining difficult issues

By MATTHEW DORF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright plans to press Israel and the Palestinians to resolve two of the most difficult issues on the peace process agenda: an Israeli "timeout" on settlement expansion and further Israeli redeployment from the West Bank.

Citing progress in Israeli-Palestinian peace talks held last week near Washington, Albright decided to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in London and with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat in Geneva.

Lower-level Israeli and Palestinian officials will work with U.S. officials on other issues such as a Palestinian airport and seaport in the Gaza Strip, and on establishing a safe passage route between the West Bank and Gaza.

Upbeat Palestinian and Israeli negotiators pledged to reconvene daily in the Middle East.

"It's a very good beginning," said Mahmoud Abbas, Arafat's deputy, after meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy and Albright. "We did not reach an agreement but we found a good deal of understanding."

Levy said, "We have still much work between us, but we will do it together."

U.S. officials tried to put the best spin on the talks in hopes that they can still persuade some Arab states to send representatives to the Middle East economic conference scheduled for later this month in Doha, Qatar, which Albright is scheduled to attend.

"On some of the issues, the gaps have clearly been narrowed and progress has been made. On others, there is still work to do," said James Rubin, State Department spokesperson.

"Each side has a better appreciation of the needs and concerns of the others on the issues."

As for the Doha conference, Rubin said, "We don't feel a greater sense of urgency about the Middle East peace process because of the Doha conference."

Prosecutions urged over Maccabiah bridge collapse

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — If Israel does not prosecute those responsible for the bridge collapse at the Maccabiah Games, the father of an Australian athlete injured in the tragedy has asked the Australian government to bar Israel from participating in the Sydney Olympics in the year 2000.

In a letter to the office of the Australian sports minister, Colin Elterman asked that Israel not be allowed to participate in the games if those responsible for the collapse are not brought to justice.

Elterman's daughter, Sasha, a tennis player, was seriously hurt when the temporary bridge collapsed.

Two Australian athletes were immediately killed July 14 and hundreds of other participants at the games injured when a pedestrian bridge collapsed during the opening ceremony at the Ramat Gan stadium, plunging scores of people into the Yarkon River.

Commission attributed responsibility

Two more Australians died weeks later as a result of complications that medical officials linked to contaminants in the river water.

A commission investigating the accident found the engineer and contractors who built the bridge at fault for poor planning and execution. It also criticized Maccabiah organizers for trying to cut costs and take a cheaper bid.

State Attorney Edna Arbel, who met this week with Australian Jewish leader Mark Liebler, said she intended to decide by the end of the month whether charges would be brought against any of those believed to be responsible for the collapse.

Liebler said that while the Australian Jewish community had not requested that Israel not be allowed to participate in the Sydney Olympics, there was a sense of frustration over what is perceived to be Israeli foot-dragging in handling the matter.

The China/Iran link

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

In a decision welcomed by Israel, President Jiang Zemin has pledged to scrap China's nuclear assistance program to Iran.

Mideast Analysis

Jiang delivered the promise to President Bill Clinton during the course of a recent visit to the United States. It is similar to an assurance given to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu by China's deputy premier, Li Lanqing, last August.

Even if China keeps its word and stops helping Iran to build a nuclear reactor, the fact of the matter is that China still remains a major supplier of military equipment to Iran and other Muslim countries.

According to a recent report released by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, China is the world's biggest supplier of advanced technology to developing nations like Iran seeking ballistic missiles, chemical weapons and nuclear devices.

China, which established formal diplomatic relations with Israel five years ago last January, has been a major source of arms to Iran since the late 1980s, when the Iran-Iraq War was still raging.

During the decade ending in 1995, China sold $3 billion (US) in weaponry and munitions to Iran. Last September, China signed a $4.5 billion agreement with Iran under which it will acquire high-performance aircraft, naval vessels, artillery pieces and cruise missiles.

Iran, a vociferous adversary of the Oslo peace process and an opponent of Israel's very existence, has been rebuilding its armed forces since the conclusion of the Iran-Iraq War in 1988. With the reported help of China and Russia, Iran is currently on the brink of completing work on a long-range missile capable of striking Israel.

Israel – itself the fifth largest arms supplier in the world – has repeatedly raised this issue with China. But China has fended off Israeli concerns with disingenuous disclaimers.

Last March, Li Lanqing, the Chinese deputy vice premier, visited Israel, and dismissed suggestions that China was selling Iran nuclear and missile technology. To hammer home the point, he declared that China had a firm policy of not escalating tensions in the Middle East.

In May 1993, in Tel Aviv, Chinese Foreign Minister Qian Qichen told Shimon Peres, the then foreign minister, that China had no intention of selling missiles to regional states at war with Israel. "China," he said, "will be very, very careful not to sell weapons that would endanger the security of your country."

As observers noted, Qian's statement echoed one he had made in September 1992 on his first visit to Israel, when he promised Yitzhak Rabin, the prime minister, that China would limit weapon sales to the Middle East and would not sell Iran an atomic reactor which could be used for military purposes.

But judging by the Central Intelligence Agency's recent assessment of China's arms policy, and Israel's own knowledge of Chinese weapons sales, China has been less than candid with respect to this sensitive subject.

In addition to Iran, China has supplied Syria, Libya, Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Egypt and Algeria with arms. Writing in the current edition of Middle East Quarterly, Frank Gaffney, Jr., director of the Centre for Security Policy in Washington, D.C., claims that China has enhanced Syria's, Libya's and Saudi Arabia's long-range missile capability.

The Chinese, he observes, regard arms sales as a means by which to generate hard currency, pay for oil imports, gain prestige and diminish the United State's influence in the Middle East.

Although Chinese proliferation activities put Israel at risk, Gafney adds, some of the deadly technology reaching Iran via China has come by way of Israel.

Israel denies having sold military technology to China, but in 1993, when Yitzhak Rabin was in China, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency alleged that Beijing had acquired Israeli technology from the now-defunct, U.S.-funded Lavi jet fighter.

In the Middle East, truth can be stranger than fiction.

Rabin assassination report to remain secret

BY LIAT COLLINS AND BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Attorney-General Elyakim Rubinstein last week instructed cabinet ministers not to reveal the classified section of the Shamgar Commission report on the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, saying the contents could not be published until further notice.

Science Minister Michael Eitan was the first cabinet member to review the classified section of the report. Eitan, who has been compiling material on alleged agent provocateur Avishai Raviv for the past two years, said afterwards he believes that some of the material he has was not known to the Shamgar Commission when it reached its conclusions.

Rubinstein ruled that ministers could see the classified section, which deals, among other things, with the role of Raviv, who was working for the General Security Service (GSS) even as he led several extreme right-wing groups and was a close companion of assassin Yigal Amir.

The decision to at least partially open the files follows the renewed debate on Raviv's role in the incitement that preceded the murder and the revival of a conspiracy theory which most MKs and ministers have rejected.

Without discussing the report itself, Eitan said that he saw no proof of a plot implicating either politicians or the GSS, but he called for a debate on the conclusions of the classified material relating to Raviv to be held at the next cabinet meeting.

"I have reason to believe the material which I have acquired was not presented to the Shamgar Commission.

"Therefore, I will demand a check into whether the government officials who were meant to supply all the information relating to Raviv's activities actually did supply it to the commission," Eitan said.

Eitan said the Raviv affair has significant implications on the rule of law. He claimed the law enforcement system "regarding this affair, did not operate and is not operating as it should in a democratic country."

He said last year he had given the State Attorney's Office the sworn statement of a member of Raviv's group, saying Raviv had incited the murder of Rabin and organized anti-Arab acts, but the office had not yet acted on it.

Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi, who also saw the report, called it "shocking." He said the material relating to the use of Raviv as an agent provocateur has serious implications.

But Meretz leader Yossi Sarid, who was privy to the classified report as a member of the ministerial committee on the GSS in the last government, said it contains "nothing at all that can redeem those political hooligans who incited against Yitzhak Rabin until he was murdered.

"It was not a GSS plant who planted the slanderous words which came out of the mouths of the leaders of the right, and it was not he who wrote their speeches and responses. It is the leaders of the right who are responsible for what happened in the country before the murder," said Sarid.

Aryeh Dean Cohen contributed to this report.

Israeli dialogue urged

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Two years after the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, nearly 41 percent of Israelis feel that neither the religious nor the secular have done sufficient soul-searching over the event or have learned practical lessons from it.

This is one of the findings from a poll commissioned by the Gesher association, which promotes understanding between the secular and religious. The survey found that 45 percent of secular respondents have this view, which is shared by 38 percent of the religious.

Asked who they thought did more soul-searching, 40.8 percent said no one; but 23.7 percent said the secular and 14.3 percent said the religious. Another 17.8 percent said both groups performed introspection equally following the murder and 3.4 percent had no opinion.

"My conclusion from the survey," said Gesher chair Daniel Tropper, "is that two years after the Rabin murder the dialogue between the religious and the secular is more vital and possible than ever, since what is common among the population is greater than what divides it."

Scholar advocated pluralism

CJN Wire Services

LONDON — Sir Isaiah Berlin, a giant in 20th-century political philosophy, avid raconteur and ardent Zionist, died in London last week after a long illness. He was 88.

Sir Isaiah was recalled as a man who reshaped political and social philosophy. A renowned scholar, he was a staunch advocate of pluralism, often warning that single truths about human behavior would lead to bloodshed and deprivation of liberty.

Sir Isaiah Berlin

He had a 60-year relationship with Oxford University, where he was a lecturer, professor and college president.

A liberal and fervent anti-communist, Sir Isaiah examined the development of liberal and totalitarian ideas, and wrote about Renaissance and Enlightenment thinkers, opera, and Russian literature.

He is perhaps best known for his 1953 essay, The Hedgehog and the Fox, and for his 1959 work, Two Concepts of Liberty, considered a major contribution to political theory.

Sir Isaiah was born in Riga, Latvia, the son of a successful timber merchant. His maternal grandfather was a chassidic rabbi. The family moved to St. Petersburg, where he was witness to the Russian Revolution. In 1919, his family moved to Britain and he attended Oxford.

He was awarded several accolades, including the Jerusalem Prize for his defence of civil liberties.

His Zionism was rooted in his belief in pluralism and not necessarily in the need to preserve Jewish culture.

One of Sir Isaiah's many close friends was Chaim Weizmann, Israel's first president.

Joint medical research planned

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

HAIFA — A new initiative by the president of the Medical Research Council of Canada (MRC) will increase cooperation between Canada and Israel in medical research.

Dr. Henry Friesen was in Israel this week to visit some of the leading medical research centres and discuss his far-reaching plans to encourage the Canadian Jewish community to participate in a newly formed partnership to be known as the Canada-Israel Health Research Foundation.

"The MRC is a leading federal agency that supports medical research across the country," explained Friesen. "The council held some discussions recently to explore international opportunities for joint projects. At the moment, the foundation is a conceptual proposal and we are now at the stage of eliciting suggestions in both Israel and Canada to see how it might work. It is for this reason that I am in Israel to discuss such possibilities of joint projects with the country's leading medical research centres. The ultimate aim of the project is to enhance scientific interaction in medical research and health sciences between Canada and Israel."

Although there are many arrangements between individuals and institutions in the two countries, there is at present no national program, he said. This initiative would transform individual efforts to a national effort, giving it a high profile in both countries.

"The financing for the new foundation would come from individuals across Canada who share in the objectives. In the first instance, the funding would be mainly dependent on contributions from the Canadian Jewish community. In the future we would hope to enlarge that constituency to include any Canadian who recognizes that discoveries can be of importance, no matter who funds and supports the initiative," Friesen said.

"Once the foundation is under way we would hope that both Canadian and Israeli government funds might become available for specific projects."

Friesen received a strongly positive response when he held meetings to sound out his ideas with representatives of the Jewish community in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg and Ottawa.

The foundation will grant funds on the basis of applications made by interested groups, individuals or institutions for projects or additional personnel support. At all stages, there would be stringent international peer reviews to evaluate the proposals, as well as to ensure that the contributions are being spent wisely. The foundation, which it is hoped will begin operation next summer, will be administered by a board selected from the contributors.

The foundation should build bridges between Canada and Israel and allow for the exchange of the latest information and opinions. It is envisaged that post-doctoral scientists beginning their careers will be eligible for fellowship grants for two years to support them in either Canada or Israel, and then a further grant of another year while they resettle in their home country.

On this first visit to Israel, Friesen and his colleague Francis Rolleston, the director of ethics and international relations of the MRC, targeted hospitals and universities with attached medical faculties. In their four-day stay, they visited the Hadassah Medical Centre, the Weizmann Institute of Science, Ben-Gurion University, the Chaim Sheba Medical Centre, the Technion and Israel's leading pharmaceutical company, Teva. In addition, they had discussions with the Israeli minister of health, Yehoshua Matza, and the chief scientists of the Ministry of Industry and Trade and the Health Ministry.

The deputy director of the Chaim Sheba Medical Centre in Ramat Gan told Friesen: "It would be an honor for us to collaborate with you. We recognize Canada as a caring society with health matters as a priority. I think that we have a lot to offer."

Prof. Karl Skorecki, who came to the Technion from Canada two years ago to continue his world renowned genetic research, also expressed his support for the project. "I am sure there would be a net gain to get this project off the ground. The individuals and organizations are already in place—we don't have to reinvent the wheel. The systems of peer reviews and the people are already here, we should just get on with it. In my opinion, post doctorates and projects are the most important factor today in health research."

ANNOUNCING

THE BRONFMAN YOUTH FELLOWSHIPS IN ISRAEL 1998

For the twelfth consecutive summer, a group of outstanding Jewish teenagers in the U.S. and Canada, coming from a wide variety of backgrounds and entering the twelfth grade of school, will be recipients of the Bronfman Youth Fellowships*. They will spend five fulfilling weeks of study, dialogue and travel in Israel.

The Bronfman Fellows will be selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the program's selection standard. Fellowship activities begin on July 6th, with a return from Israel on August 12th. All meals will be kosher, and Sabbath activities will be in the spirit of the day.

Based in Jerusalem, the Fellows will engage in an intense interaction with a diverse rabbinic faculty and counselors, representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives. They will explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs ... take part, at a time of rapid change, in seminars with some of the country's leading political and cultural figures ... debate ideas and search for insights on the different ways to define oneself as a Jew today, all in an atmosphere of mutual respect and open dialogue.

The purpose: to return home with a new understanding of the myriad issues facing the Jewish people and the Jewish state, and a new appreciation of the need for dialogue among Jews.

* Fellowships cover all expenses including roundtrip transportation between New York and Israel, room and board, travel in Israel and incidentals.

Is PA hiding arms for Iraq?

PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's political adviser Nabil Amr said, "I have no idea about this information."

Asked if it was conceivable that the embassy could be used to hide sensitive Iraqi documents, he declined to comment.

The PA embassy is situated in Arafat's private residence in Baghdad, a heavily guarded palatial structure well inside a compound.

"The material is in Yasser Arafat's house," the Iraqi exile said. "It's a fact."

One of the Iraqi opposition groups' American sympathizers, who worked with them in London from 1991 to 1994 and recently resumed activity on their behalf in Washington, said the hidden documents refer to Iraq's chemical weapons, VX nerve gas, "and possibly nuclear arms."

Arafat's residence, "which has just been designated as the PA embassy," he went on, has extra-territorial status and therefore "it is difficult for the UN arms inspectors to make a fuss about it."

Speaking for the Iraqi opposition, the source said, "we have had agents at the site who could see that the embassy building is used to hide documents."

He said the nerve gas is stored in a solid state, "like salt," and probably is deposited in the Iraqi desert.

The alleged existence of secret repositories that effectively are off limits to the UN Special Commission (UNSCOM) was reported to its British chair, Richard Butler, in a confidential letter sent by the Iraqi exiles on Sept. 16. Its text contains these passages:

"We learned certain information from sources in Baghdad which will be of use to you.

"We believe there are documents regarding Iraq's weapons of mass destruction hidden in St. Joseph's Church in the Dora district. The church is on the main street across from the Assyrian market.

"There are also important documents being stored at the Baghdad residence of President Yasser Arafat in the Jadiriya district."

The cordial relations between the PA and Saddam's regime are borne out by a report in the Palestinian press this week that $100 million (US) in aid from the Iraqi government is being blocked by the UN.

Sources here believe Iraq is interested in exporting oil to the PA through Jordan in addition to providing monetary assistance or as a substitute for it, but this is being prevented by Israel. "It could be a lucrative proposition for all the parties concerned," a source said, "Iraq, Jordan, Israel and the PA."

Elements of the Palestinian Police were trained in Iraq "and the Iraqi government pays the PA for using camps on Iraqi soil," the source went on, contending that Iraq has been actively involved in preparing terrorists for missions that it initiates.

"Arafat never stopped his relations with Iraqi intelligence," a Palestinian familiar with the inner workings of the PA said.

He said Arafat's reported meeting in Amman with Iraq's ambassador on Aug. 8, "actually was with a senior Iraqi intelligence officer. The Iraqi Embassy was the logical venue, because Iraqi intelligence personnel never stay in hotels when they are abroad."

Israel's physicians search for new treatment methods

By WENDY ELLIMAN
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Thousands of Israel's physicians not only care for the sick, they also actively search for more and better ways to prevent, diagnose, treat and cure.

This year, as in the past, Israelis have developed new drugs and found new uses for known drugs; they have extended our knowledge of how the body works, introduced new treatment techniques and put medical consultations on line with new digital technology.

The very large number of health professionals in Israel, one of the highest per capita rates of physicians in the world according to a recent British study, is undoubtedly one of the reasons why the country has come up with so many medical innovations in recent years.

Two drugs recently developed in Israel are of particular importance, as they slow the progression of two relentless and incurable diseases – multiple sclerosis (MS) and Parkinson's.

Injected every other day, the long-heralded Copaxone, developed at the Weizmann Institute of Science over the past 30 years, reduces both the severity and frequency of MS attacks. Israel approved its use last November, and FDA approval followed soon afterward.

The second major new drug slows the ravages of Parkinson's disease, and may possibly halt it entirely if taken early enough. Known as L-Dopa ethyl ester, it was developed at the Hebrew University and Rabin Medical Centre as an alternative to L-Dopa, which loses its effectiveness over the long term.

A third new made-in-Israel compound was declared safe and effective last March. It is an influenza vaccine in the form of nose drops, and its Hadassah Medical Centre developers believe it will be a breakthrough in controlling flu.

These compounds are totally new. Other Israeli researchers have found new uses for old drugs. The headache clinic team at Meir Hospital in Kfar Saba, for example, have used a muscle relaxant developed 80 years ago in Switzerland to control migraine headaches. They found it substantially reduces the frequency of migraines in four-fifths of patients tested, and prevents it altogether in one-third of them. Trying Baclophen for headache prevention was no lucky chance: the reasoning was that since it stabilizes myelin in the neurons, it will prevent release of headache-triggering substances.

Doctors at Tel Aviv University and the Schneider Children's Medical Centre of Israel, have found new use for a drug first synthesized 10 years ago to speed growth in patients with dwarfism or Laron's syndrome. Doctors now believe it can also reduce the risk of heart attack. An insulin-like hormone (IGF-I), the drug lowers lipoprotein levels in the blood – one of the important risk factors in cardiovascular disease. Prof. Zvi Laron, a leading pediatric endocrinologist (who gave his name to Laron's syndrome – one of only two diseases named for an Israeli), believes this can "contribute to treatment of people at high risk for cardiovascular diseases and even play a determining role in preventing these diseases."

IGF-I has also been found helpful in controlling non-insulin-dependent diabetes, "and there is hope, according to our new data, that [it] will be accepted as a drug to extend the life of diabetes patients," says Laron.

Diabetes has been the focus of several Israeli researchers during the past year, and two groups have come up with new ways of treating "diabetic foot." This common complication results from poor blood circulation, with too many diabetics developing gangrene of the foot, which requires amputation.

Parasitologists at the Hebrew University-Hadassah Medical School have come up with an effective –but far from esthetic – solution: placing maggots on the infected wounds to eat away necrotic tissue and allow healthy skin layers to grow. So far the procedure has been performed on five patients and it has been completely successful. The researchers took the idea from Napoleon's chief military physician and from the U.S. Civil War's chief medical officer. They believe it can also be successfully used for burns, sores, abscesses and chronic bone infections.

A Russian-born vascular expert and a Jerusalem gynecologist-cum-rabbi are the team who have developed the second new "diabetic foot" treatment. They inject into the blocked blood vessels of the foot the same medication that is injected into blood vessels in the penis to expand them and cure impotence. In some 500 diabetics, they have achieved an 80 percent success rate, with no amputations necessary.

Another Weizmann Institute discovery this past year concerns the battle between man and increasingly antibiotic-resistant bacteria. Biochemists at Weizmann have identified a molecule (MdfA) that enables bacteria to resist a wide range of drugs. They hope MdfA will serve as a model for greater understanding of multi-drug resistance, perhaps even clarifying its influence in human cancers.

Cancers – prevention and treatment – remain a key area for research. A gene mutation responsible for breast and ovarian cancer was discovered in Israel in May by researchers at the Sheba Hospital at Tel HaShomer. Women carrying this mutation are advised to come for regular examination for early detection.

A technique for treating cancers that attack the brain was one of several very new medical techniques being pioneered in a handful of medical centres worldwide. Israeli hospitals among them. The Hebrew University-Hadassah Medical Centre this year became the only centre outside the United States to perform a technique to use effective chemotherapy for cancers of the brain. Injecting the sugar solution mannitol into the artery that supplies blood to the brain, they open a tiny temporary window in the well-fortified blood-brain barrier, and slip chemotherapeutic drugs across it.

Chanukah Continuity Campaign

As our way of helping to ensure the irreversibility of Jewish continuity, The CJN is launching a special continuity subscription campaign in time for Chanukah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $14.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Over the past few years, The CJN has grown and evolved into an award-winning national community newspaper widely read both here in Canada and abroad. We are extremely proud of this publication. Could there be a better gift at Chanukah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Sincerely,

The editor.

Actress' dream comes true

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — When The CJN last wrote about her five years ago, Mia Kirshner, then a teenager attending Jarvis Collegiate here, had just landed a part on the TV show The Freshman.

Her acting career has come a long way since then. Kirshner, now 22, divides her time between working on a degree in literature and acting in major films.

She can currently be seen in Mad City opposite icons Dustin Hoffman and John Travolta.

"I always wanted to be an actress," Kirshner says in her demure voice that yet has an imperial-like quality. "In my wildest dreams, I did imagine myself in a Hollywood film, but I never thought it would be real."

If anything, the shy, soft-spoken, actress seems almost the antithesis of a Hollywood star. I get the impression she is actually enjoying the limelight of her first press tour across several cities in the United States and Canada.

"It's very strange for me to be here," she says. "When I was little, I used to watch actors and actresses being interviewed and I used to pretend it was me. Now I find I'm mentioned in the same film encyclopedias I used to love to read."

A major press tour such as the one she's on is a very gruelling task. Yet Kirshner takes it all in stride.

"You have to be grateful for every opportunity given to you. I know there are many girls who would love to be here doing what I'm doing, so I can't complain."

Mia Kirshner starts in Mad City opposite Dustin Hoffman.

Kirshner's big career break came in two successive provocative roles that received much critical attention. The first was playing a dominatrix in Denys Arcand's Love and Human Remains and the second was her role as a stripper in Atom Egoyan's Exotica.

She then landed parts in various Hollywood projects opposite Christian Slater, Jack Lemmon, Walter Matthau and Sissy Spacek.

But even with all this experience, it was difficult for the Toronto-born actress to act with professional decorum opposite such giants as Hoffman and Travolta.

"I was absolutely starstruck and completely in awe," she says of her first days on the set of Mad City. "I would turn into putty around John Travolta."

Kirshner plays Laurie Callahan a young, idealistic and impressionable intern reporter at a small town television station. Working on a routine budget story at a museum, with a seasoned investigative reporter (Hoffman) whose career has been going downhill since his clash with a veteran network anchor (Alan Alda), she ends up in the middle of the hottest story in the country.

A disgruntled laid-off security guard (Travolta) returns to the museum demanding his job back, and takes a group of visiting school kids hostage.

Although Kirshner is on the periphery of much of the action, she perhaps plays one of the most important characters, as she's bounced off the conflicting personalities of Hoffman and Alda. Her shocking statements at the end of the movie will catch many moviegoers by surprise.

"There's such a subtle change in her character, she herself doesn't see it happening," Kirshner says of Laurie, and almost begs forgiveness for her sudden shift. "She's just doing what she was told to do."

Despite Kirshner's busy acting schedule, she still wants to finish her course at McGill, where she's specializing in Russian literature.

"When I'm at school, I'm at school, and when I work, my focus is my career," she says. "I like school and like to be with people my own age, but my career is really taking a shape of its own."

Although she wants to finish school, she admits it may take her awhile. "I have to take every acting opportunity I can get. It's so expensive to go to school these days and I like the fact that I'm able to pay my own way."

Although Mia Kirshner is not a household name, she's already developing a fan base. There are a number of Web pages dedicated to her on the Internet.

"That's a really strange feeling," she says. "I don't think of myself [as a star]. I consider myself very normal and down to earth."

At a recent premiere screening of The Devil's Advocate, one devotee came up to her brandishing her first publicity photo from many years ago.

"I mean where did he get it from? I don't even have one!"

Maybe not, but here at The CJN offices, her father, veteran reporter Sheldon Kirshner, has that picture proudly framed above his desk.

"By no means did we sit weeping on the banks of the waters of Babylon... our endeavour with respect to art was commensurate with our will to live."

Viktor Ullmann

An allegory on the nature of fascism and the low value it places on human life, Ullmann's chamber opera The Emperor of Atlantis was in its final days of rehearsal at the concentration camp of Terezin when an SS delegation found the satire in the piece too close for comfort—it was never performed. Shortly afterwards the "model ghetto" was deemed to have outlived its usefulness and nearly all the composers and artists in the camp were sent to their deaths.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

ISRAEL READIES TO CELEBRATE 50TH

Despite the difficulties on the peace road, Israel is planning major touristic events, beginning next month, to mark its 50th anniversary.

Official festivities begin on the evening of Dec. 23, when Jews around the world light the first candle of Chanukah. The theme of the year-long celebrations is hope, which is also the theme of Israel's national anthem, Hatikvah (The Hope).

Some planned events:

On Feb. 11, 1998, the Light of Peace, a sculpture designed by legendary surrealist Salvador Dali, will be installed at Ben Gurion airport to greet all visitors. Feb. 1 is Tu B'Shvat, known as the New Year for trees, and on this day the first seedlings for a new forest will be planted between Be'ersheva and Arad in the Negev desert.

In April, every segment of Israeli society and many foreign visitors will join in the Jubilee Jerusalem March, re-creating the biblical trek to Jerusalem. Also in April, an artistic festival in the Galilean town of Horpish will salute Israel's Arab, Christian, Druze and other minorities.

On April 30, 50,000 are expected for a birthday rally in a stadium in Ramat Gan, a Tel Aviv suburb.

The opening ceremony for this Israel Independence Day party will rival that of the Olympic games.

In April and May, more than 5,000 Gentiles who risked their lives to save Jews during WWII will be brought to Israel and honored at the Knesset. In May, the world's foremost fashion designers will salute Israel in style at a Fashion Festival in Eilat.

In June, a Masada Concert will feature international singers, backed by the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, performing the ancient story of heroism and martyrdom from Roman oppression. And in July, several gourmet and culinary festivals will take place in Eilat, Herzliiya, Kiryat Shemona and Kiryat Malachi.

For more information, contact the Israel Government Tourist Office, 416-964- 3784 or email igto@idirect.com or 800-669-2369.

Jewish Postcards in N.Y.: Some 200 turn-of-the-century postcards from the permanent collection of the Library of the Jewish Theological Seminary are on display in the exhibition Past Perfect: Jewish Experience in Early 20th Century Postcards.

Many cards are devoted to the Jewish New Year, and run the gamut from whimsical to mystical. Some cards celebrate America's growing love affair with transportation, women in airplanes, couples in canoes and children on trains. Some cards carry Zionist messages and others depict families at traditional festive meals. 3080 Broadway Ave., New York. Until Dec. 30. 212-678-8975.

Travel Books: It's been 25 years since Australians Maureen and Tony Wheeler home- published Across Asia On The Cheap. Since then the company they formed, Lonely Planet, has become synonymous with first-rate travel guides covering an increasing number of destinations.

Today there are more than 180 Lonely Planet guides, most characterized by informative, balanced descriptions, interesting sidebars and plenty of maps and illustrations.

Titles of special interest to Jewish travelers cover Poland, Hungary, Portugal and Spain and the cities of Amsterdam and New York. Having walked around England's Peak district several times, I found Lonely Planet's recently-released Walking in Britain to be informative and useful.

Poet clings to love and compassion

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Honey Novick is a singer, composer and poet who is an atheist but says she clings to a Judaism which teaches love, compassion and tzedakah.

She attended Yom Kippur services this year, she says, partly to honor the memory of people who have touched her life and were the motivation for her latest album In Tribute.

The 48-year-old singer, a product of 1960s' "flower power" generation doesn't resent being reminded that she left home to run away to Hollywood when only 17, or that she still supports left-wing causes today.

She traces her independent spirit to her grandmother, the sixth child of a North African Jew who had three wives and 24 children. Her late mother, Yachevel, was a sabra; and her late father, David, the first milkman in Toronto to use a horse and cart, was brought to Palestine in 1912 at the age of three.

They met in Toronto at a meeting of the Palestine Canada Culture Club. The passage to Canada of Novick's mother and an uncle was paid by an aunt who read fortunes to raise the money.

An only child, she never moved with her parents from Palmerston Avenue to Reiner Road in North York, preferring to live downtown, but she kept in touch.

"My parents loved opera and often asked me to sing arias from Madame Butterfly. My father marvelled that I could earn more in a night than he did all week delivering milk."

As a youngster, she attended Camp Naivelt, and Camp Youngvelt and found a secular home in the United Jewish Peoples Order.

Long before becoming a performer and opening her Creative Vocalization Studio, Novick was an office temp, a waitress, a hat check girl and a "gofer" at the Theatre Workshop of George Luscombe.

She lived at Rochdale, the hangout for hippies of the day, and one of the songs in her new album is dedicated to Jane and Bob Jacobs, whose children she met there.

Whenever she can, she attends the monthly meeting of the Yiddish Vinkl at Ed Mirvish's Warehouse restaurant.

Exodus was filmed at her uncle's place in Israel and as a brash teenager, she used that as a calling card to meet the late Sal Mineo, a star of Exodus, when he played Toronto. She left for Hollywood to be an assistant on one of his films, but came back to Toronto in three months because she had discovered her true love – music and the human voice.

Other songs in her new album are dedicated to artists Jorge Sala and Ron Gabe of General Idea, John Hirsch and Allen Ginsberg, poets Milton Acorn and Irving Layton, science fiction writer Judy Merril and jazz musician Wayne Shorter.

Call 416-782-7944 for information about her new album.

CBC documentary on wartime Berlin lovers

Love Story (CBC Newsworld, Nov. 16 at 8 p.m.) is an award-winning documentary based on the true-life love relationship between an ardent Nazi and a Jew in wartime Berlin.

Both the protagonists are women. One is Lilly Wust, 26, the wife of a German soldier and mother of four boys. For her child-bearing efforts, she was awarded a medal by the Nazis.

The other is Felice Schragenheim, 21, who avoids being transported to the camps by going underground. She meets Lilly at a cafe and the two fall in love right away.

The documentary mixes interviews with the survivors of this story with the usual archival wartime footage. It is a well-told story, part romance, part thriller and deeply-moving.

TORONTO — Mathieu Schneider's talent level is perhaps most evident in practice, where he's clearly the best defenceman on the ice. He can turn on a dime, skate effortlessly to gather up the puck in his own zone and fire it up to a winger, hitting him on the tape.

In game situations, he's just as good, staying calm under pressure and moving the puck quickly to a teammate while other Leaf rearguards are content to slam it around the boards and out.

In the first 14 games of the season, he was tied for second among Leaf scorers with one goal and seven assists, three points behind Leafs captain Mats Sundin. Last week, he was one of the first 17 players chosen to form the nucleus of the U.S. Olympic team, rejoining many of his teammates from last year's World Cup squad that beat Canada's best, two games to one.

So, with all that to his credit, why was he the subject of trade rumors all summer long? Why would the Leafs consider moving their best defenceman, who was called one of the league's 10 best by assistant GM Bill Watters when he was acquired in a trade from the New York Islanders?

Schneider, 28, believes a number of factors conspired to keep his name front and centre in trade talk. He was badly injured last season and missed about 50 games. On top of that, the Leafs had a terrible season, missed the playoffs and dumped longtime manager Cliff Fletcher along the way. Perhaps the new management team, unsure about his health, were looking to make some changes in the hope of improving the team, Schneider suggested.

Any way you cut it, the off-season rumors didn't affect him much. He spent much of the summer in California, working hard to rehabilitate his sore stomach and groin muscles and he says his pain-free play early in the season has put those concerns to rest.

On most nights, he's head and shoulders the best Leafs defenceman. Much of his success stems from his skating ability and he says that as one of the team's veterans, "I'm looked to for leadership on the club... You try to lead by example. There's not that much to say [in the dressing room] at this level."

Not too long ago, Schneider did have a lot to say about the team, but not to his teammates. He went on the record to suggest management should cut coach Mike Murphy some slack, stop interfering and let him run the team his own way.

Mathieu Schneider

"It was something I felt at the time and I stand by it," he said. "Things have been good around here since. I don't want to say anything to hurt the team, especially since we have such a young club."

The result of his outspoken remarks has been a management vote of confidence in Murphy, Schneider added.

At any rate, Schneider would much rather focus on the game of hockey than its off-ice issues. A day before the team faced off against the Montreal Canadiens, he was excited about the prospects of playing his old team.

Games in Montreal are always exciting because of the atmosphere surrounding the team. There's usually electricity in the air and the team has a special aura because of its longstanding success, he said.

In both Toronto and Montreal, hockey is the number 1 sport and the players are celebrities. Teams coming in to play two of the original six are especially fired up and the games are more intense than those he experienced playing for the Islanders. A lot of teams have two or three players from the Toronto area and they want to play well in front of their friends and family, Schneider said.

While that may make home games tougher in Toronto than in most other NHL cities, Schneider believes it's important for the Leafs to "establish ourselves on home ice." But so far this season, the Leafs' road record of 3-3-2 far outshines its home record of 1-4-1.

During the summer, Schneider decided to stay close to home and pass up a visit to Israel for the Maccabiah Games. He made rehabilitating his injury his top priority but "something I always wanted to do was make a trip to Israel," he said.

In the run-up to the '97 Games, which featured hockey for the first time, Schneider helped Canadian organizers raise funds for the team. Although he couldn't make it to Israel, his brother, Jean-Alain, played defence for the team, which cruised to a gold medal victory over the United States.

Mathieu said he had hoped to go to Israel as a goodwill ambassador and he still hopes that he'll be able to perform that role in future Maccabiahs. While his brother played for Canada, Mathieu said he couldn't see himself playing against the United States.

As for his brother, "he loved it. It was a great experience and Canada really did a super job in organizing the team," Mathieu said.

Their father, Sam, was involved in an organizational role with the American team early on, but pulled out over disagreements with the team's management. Lack of good organization really hurt the U.S. squad, Mathieu said.

Meanwhile, Schneider is looking forward to his own taste of international competition next February at the Nagano Olympics, where the United States, along with Canada and Sweden, should be a gold medal contender.

In the meantime, Schneider expects to continue the fairly low community profile he's maintained since moving to Toronto. Unlike his experiences in Montreal or New York, where he was available for Jewish community events, "it's been a pretty tough one-and-a-half years for me in Toronto, with my injury and with the overall play of the team," he said. "I don't enjoy going out [and answering fans' questions]. I kind of seclude myself when things aren't going well.

"I realize that in the Jewish community I'm looked up to as a role model as something [young people] can attain to," he added.

Correction

In our story last week, "Book recounts the time boxing was a Jewish sport," we incorrectly referred to Benny Leonard as a light heavyweight champion. In fact, he was world lightweight champion from 1917-25.

The Inside Back

Snow White and the Seven Directors

By JORDAN MAX

It was yet another long, raucous shul board meeting. The seven men, who were also the only remaining paid members, were at it again, trying to figure out what to do for the upcoming High Holy Days, only 10 months away. Should they hire a professional chazzan, or let Beryl lead the davening again? The debate was getting heated, with the usual factions, led by Beryl and Moishe (whose cousin Motti was, coincidentally, a retired chazzan) making their usual arguments.

Stan, the current president, was the deciding vote. He was just about to break the tie when there was a gentle but firm knock at the door. The directors turned to see a beautiful young woman standing at the door, holding a newspaper.

"Is this the place advertising for a secretary?" she asked.

"Yes, you saw our ad?" Stan answered excitedly. "You're hired. When can you start? What's your name?'

"My name is Snow White," she replied softly. "I can start immediately. What are the responsibilities and benefits?" She had been desperately looking for work, and was intrigued by the ad, which offered generous pay plus benefits.

Stan told her that the job paid 300 a week, entailed general secretarial and bookkeeping work, a little cleaning and a bissel kosher cooking, while the benefits were all the herring and sponge cake she could eat.

Snow White, looking puzzled, then asked, "What's a bissel kosher?"

There was stunned silence in the room, relieved only by the sound of mouths hitting the floor. Stan, sensing the delicacy of the issue, asked Snow White to wait outside a minute while they discussed the terms of her contract.

Behind the door, she could hear table pounding and furious yelling in a strange language she had never heard before. After an hour, Stan emerged "Congratulations, Miss White, you got the job by a vote of four to two, with one abstention. You can start right away. Now let me introduce you to the board. I'm Stan, and this is Beryl, Moishe, Dovid, Yankl, Itzik and Shmuel. First, you'll need to take minutes from this directors meeting and distribute copies to all the directors in time for our next meeting tomorrow."

Snow White accepted and took her new job in earnest, cleaning, vacuuming, replacing burnt-out light bulbs in the sanctuary, setting up a proper office, and even adding a photocopier, a computer and a fax machine. In no time, the little shul began to sparkle and shine. The directors could hardly believe their good luck in finding such a secretary.

Over time, even the Beryl faction began to accept her, and taught her how to cook kosher. Although Shabbat morning services were the same as they had always been, they now looked forward to Miss White's delicious cholent.

Everything was going fine, until one day, a Revenue Canada official showed up and began asking Snow White a lot of questions about the shul finances and why a tax return hadn't been filed in 10 years.

Beryl, who was practising his chazzanut, heard the commotion and came running to the office. He immediately phoned his nephew Harold the accountant, who would know what to do.

Meanwhile, the auditor's questions had so mesmerized Snow White that she fell into a deep sleep.When Harold the accountant arrived, he bravely lunged at the auditor with his business card and firmly stated that he was now representing the shul, and that any further questions should go to him.

With that, the auditor packed up his briefcase and left. Beryl brought Slivovitz for Snow White, but to no avail. Harold knelt down and took her hand. Snow White awoke groggily and gazed into Harold's nearsighted eyes.

The rest, as they say, is history. Harold hired Snow White to work for him at a better salary, although she did miss the limitless herring and sponge cake. The seven directors were sad to see her leave, but they had learned some valuable lessons. And Beryl even agreed to have the shul hire a professional chazzan for the next High Holy Days.

SALMON WON TONS

A great cocktail appetizer!

8 oz cream cheese; softened
1 cup flaked salmon (canned or cooked)
1 tblsp onion, minced
1 garlic clove, crushed & minced
1 pkg won ton wrappers

Sauce:
1 cup chili sauce
2 tblsp horseradish
1 tsp Worcestershire sauce

Mix cream cheese, salmon, onion, and garlic together. Lay out won ton wrappers, and place 1 tsp. of the mixture in the centre of each. Moisten edges of each with water. Fold over and pinch edges well to seal. Deep fry the won tons or bake at 375°F. until golden brown. Drain well on absorbent paper. Serve hot with a sauce.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My 69-year-old father was just diagnosed with a neurological illness that causes muscular atrophy. As a result, he is suffering from urgency and incontinence of urine. When at home, he can usually make it to the bathroom in time. When he goes out, he carries a container. Is there a better solution?

Bashful Daughter

Dear Bashful Daughter,

Thank you so much for bringing this matter to our attention. Statistics show that more than 1.5 million Canadian men experience some form of urinary incontinence (urine leakage). I suggest that you and your father first speak to your father's family practitioner in order to explore potential treatments and/or behavior modification. In the meantime, you may want to try one of the several methods of managing different types of incontinence. For example, he may use an external catheter system, which is convenient, clean and comfortable and will help in alleviating existing physical, social and psychological distress, or try a male absorbent pouch. Both are available by calling your local pharmacy. For general information and a list of specialists in your area, you can call the Canadian Continence Foundation at 1-800-265-9575 or 514-932-3535.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

PM offers message of hope

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

INDIANAPOLIS — Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu delivered a message of conciliation and hope here last Sunday to approximately 4,000 delegates, nearly 100 of whom were from Canada, at the 66th General Assembly (GA) of the Council of Jewish Federations.

The vast majority of delegates were anxious to hear Netanyahu articulate his government's policy on what has become known as the "unity" issue.

He did not keep them waiting long. After a brief introductory allusion to the current United Nations (UN) crisis with Iraq, Netanyahu cut right to the matter.

"There can be no such thing as a second class Jew," Netanyahu asserted to the sustained applause of the delegates.

"We are determined to reach a consensus between us. It will have to be a creative solution, a Jewish solution, allowing at once continuity and change, involvement and inclusion, alongside stability and purposeful evolution.

"You are not a third party looking in. You are partners at the table, partners in the common cause of Jewish unity."

At the heart of the controversy are two bills pending in the Knesset. One would bar non-Orthodox representatives on local religious councils in Israel. The other would codify Orthodox control over religious conversions performed in Israel.

Reform and Conservative Jews, who comprise approximately three-quarters of North American affiliated Jewry, are up in arms at the prospect of the bills becoming law. They view the measures as an attempt to preclude them from organized, religious involvement in Israel and as an affront to their religious legitimacy.

To resolve the matter, Netanyahu appointed a seven member panel, five of whom are Orthodox, two non-Orthodox, with Ya'acov Ne'eman as chair. The panel is attempting to find a solution acceptable to all streams. It is the first time in Israel's history that all three major streams of Jewish observance have officially sat at the same table.

Ne'eman was scheduled to address the GA on Monday.

Netanyahu reminded the audience that they would have the opportunity to present their views directly to Ne'eman. As if seeming to foreshadow a positive outcome to the controversy, Netanyahu offered that he believed he "will be coming here soon with Ya'acov Ne'eman with a solution."

Mayor Mel says thanks

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To Metro's Jewish voters, some heartfelt gratitude from Toronto's megamayor-elect, via The CJN.

"What I can really say is thank-you," sighs a tired Mel Lastman. "They came out like you wouldn't believe, everywhere. The Jewish community...they were jammed. They were lined up waiting to vote.

"The Jewish community was unbelievable, particularly the Orthodox. They came out from everywhere!"

Indeed, several bearded, kippah-wearing men appeared on stage with Lastman, his wife Marilyn and other jubilant supporters on the night of his stunning victory over Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall.

By most accounts, Lastman was put over the top by winning 80 percent of the vote in North York, home to a sizeable portion of Metro's Jewish community. "That's unheard of," he enthuses. "I couldn't believe it."

He now joins former mayors Nathan Phillips and Phil Givens as top Jewish powers in Toronto's municipal government, and is arguably the second most influential Jewish elected official in Canada, after Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray.

Lastman, North York's Yiddish-spouting favorite son for 25 years, is still walking on clouds. On the night of his win, he seemed stunned, despite his respectable 4-3 margin of victory.

"I couldn't believe I even won," he explains. "I was shocked at the amount I won by. Everybody was down my back. Polls indicated I was way ahead. [And] the press was killing me. Constantly. They were all trying to knock me down, every one of them."

CANADA

Supreme Court Ruling

OTTAWA — The Supreme Court of Canada ruled last week that a parent cannot prevent a former spouse from taking their child to religious activities.

The decision struck down a Quebec Court of Appeal ruling that prevented a Jehovah's Witness from exposing her child to the religion.

The Supreme Court said religious activities do not expose a child to harm.

Bonds-BB Breakfast

HAMILTON — Judy Feld Carr recently addressed the State of Israel Bonds-Hamilton B'nai Brith breakfast here, telling close to 200 guests about the rescue of Syrian Jews and her role in the process.

The breakfast honored Harold Goldblatt, Howard Katz and Jay State.

ISRAEL

Israel, Vatican Sign Deal

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Vatican have signed an accord formally recognizing the legal status of Roman Catholic Church institutions in Israel.

The accord, which requires the Knesset's approval, would give the church judicial standing similar to foreign non-profit organizations and corporations. It would also enable the church to handle internal issues independently.

Withdrawal Movement

JERUSALEM — A group of Israeli lawmakers have given their support to a new movement that will lobby for an Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon.

The movement merged with "Four Mothers," a grassroots group of mothers of Israeli soldiers who are demanding that the army pull out of the security zone.

Land Mines Conference

JERUSALEM — Israel plans to participate in a conference on banning land mines, scheduled to take place next month in Ottawa. Foreign Minister David Levy recently confirmed that Israel would be present at the international conference.

More than 100 countries are expected to sign an international treaty at the conference banning the use of land mines.

Edelstein To See Pollard

JERUSALEM — Israeli absorption minister Yuli Edelstein intends to visit convicted spy Jonathan Pollard when he visits the United States next week.

If the visit takes place, Edelstein would be the second – and the highest-ranking – Israeli official to meet with the former U.S. Navy intelligence analyst during the 12 years he has been imprisoned.

Onassis Kidnapping

JERUSALEM — An Israeli man has been detained in Europe on suspicion of plotting to kidnap the granddaughter of the late shipping magnate Aristotle Onassis.

The arrest in Milan came just days after the Israeli police dropped their investigation into an alleged plot to kidnap Athena Roussel, the 12-year-old heiress to the Onassis fortune.

But Swiss officials still believe that at least six Israelis conspired to kidnap her while she was vacationing with her father in St. Moritz, Switzerland, earlier this year.

WORLD

Holocaust Museum Exhibit

WASHINGTON — on Nov. 21, the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum will launch an exhibition dedicated to the ghetto in Kovno, Lithuania.

The Hidden History of the Kovno Ghetto brings together for the first time a wealth of materials that, since the end of World War II, have been scattered throughout the world. It will contain over 275 objects and nearly 225 images gathered from Canada, the United States, Lithuania, Latvia, Russia, Germany and Israel.

Creative Writing Contest

NEW YORK — Three prizes will be given by the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education (CAJE) for the best original short stories on a Jewish theme or topic in the eighth annual David Dornstein Memorial Creative Writing Contest for Young Adult Writers.

The contest is open to writers between the ages of 18 and 35. Deadline is Dec. 31, 1997. For more information call 212-268-4210; fax 212-268-4214 or e-mail [500-8447@MCIMAIL.COM].

Miracle Mission

NEW YORK — To honor Israel's 50th anniversary, Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, has organized a unique mission to Israel. The megamission, from March 8 to 18, 1998, is dubbed Miracle Mission and will feature 18 separate, especially tailored tracks and itineraries.

The Miracle Mission is open to all. For more information contact the Hadassah Travel Department at 1-800-363-2373.

200,000 Israelis Rally in Rabin's Memory

JERUSALEM — An estimated 200,000 people attended a memorial rally Nov. 8 in Tel Aviv to mark the second anniversary of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

Police estimated that the crowd, which spilled over into the side streets surrounding the square where Rabin was slain, represented one of the largest gatherings ever in Israeli history.

The rally was held against the backdrop of a deeply divided nation, whose political leaders have in recent days been exchanging barbs over the events surrounding the murder and its commemoration.

While rally organizers stressed that the demonstration was apolitical, the demonstration had a clear anti-government tone.

The only member of the government to address the crowd was Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky, who was heckled by some in the crowd when he took the podium.

URGENT APPEAL

We are appealing to the members of our community to help a family facing tragically difficult challenges at this time. Dov, his wife and their eight children moved to Jerusalem a number of years ago. There, he became a successful sofer (scribe) and teacher.

Recently, tragedy struck. Their youngest daughter required lifesaving heart surgery in Boston to correct a rare heart condition. The cost of the operation was $200,000 U.S. This depleted all of the family's funds and burdened them with a heavy debt. Now, Dov has been stricken with cancer and due to the arduous treatments, he is unable to work. The family is in desperate straits.

We turn to individuals such as yourself to help this family in their time of need. In merit of your generous act of tzedaka, may you be blessed with health and happiness. Thank you.

Anti-Semitic column doesn't promote hate: tribunal

By: DAVID J. LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Pacific region, had a mixed reaction to the B.C. Human Rights Tribunal's recent ruling regarding controversial North Shore News columnist Doug Collins.

The tribunal, chaired by Nitya Iyer, coordinated public hearings over the summer. It upheld the constitutionality of B.C.'s legislation against hate speech and concluded that Collins' column, Hollywood Propaganda, which was about Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List, was anti-Semitic "and likely to make it more acceptable for others to express hatred or contempt against Jewish people."

But despite the fact that Iyer characterized Collins' column as "nasty, insulting, smug and anti-Semitic," she concluded that it was not hateful enough to warrant action under section 2 of the B.C. Human Rights Act, which allows citizens to seek a "remedy" for material that would expose them to hatred.

Michael Elterman, chair of the CJC Pacific region, had mixed feelings about the ruling. On the one hand, Elterman pointed out that Congress "was disappointed that the tribunal did not feel that there was sufficient severity of hatred to require a remedy, but on the other hand, he said, part of our goal was accomplished.

"Collins' writing has been described as anti-Semitic, hateful and offensive by the ruling and we're also pleased that the constitutionality of the Human Rights Act was upheld, because it will be useful for our and other ethnic religious groups in the future should they encounter similar types of vitriolic writing," he explained.

Doug Collins

But Elterman was puzzled by the mixed message of the tribunal's findings. According to Elterman, although the tribunal found that the article would likely cause anti-Semitism and hatred in those who read it, they didn't they feel that it was sufficiently hateful " to be considered in breach of the Human Rights Act and that it required a remedy."

Congress, which initiated the action against Collins and the North Shore News, is at this time, considering further judicial action against Collins and the North Shore News.

Elterman, who notes that Collins was upset that the law was upheld, suspects that the North Shore News and the B.C. Civil Liberties Action will take the case to the Supreme Court to challenge the constitutionality of the legislation. If that occurs, he said he hopes the CJC will intervene.

Museum's Holocaust wing opposed by some veterans

CJN Staff

OTTAWA — Plans for a Holocaust memorial and gallery at the Canadian War Museum were defended last week, amid some opposition from veterans' groups.

Adrienne Clarkson, board chair of the Canadian Museum of Civilization, held a news conference to defuse criticism that the Holocaust gallery would be out of place at the war museum.

Clarkson said the Holocaust addition is appropriate because Canada fought against fascism and Nazism during World War II.

Jewish groups, particularly the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, have long supported the idea.

But Clifford Chadderton, head of the War Amps and the National Council of Veterans Associations, is opposed, saying that while a Holocaust memorial is a good idea, it commemorates an event that is not part of Canada's war history.

Other veterans' groups, including the Royal Canadian Legion, said they weren't consulted about the plans, adding the memorial should be in the Museum of Civilization in Hull or in a separate building.

But retired colonel Murray Johnson, head of the Passing the Torch fundraising campaign for the addition, defended the Holocaust wing, saying it was the Allies who defeated the "barbarism" of the Nazis.

The memorial and wing devoted to the Holocaust are part of a $12 million renovation at the Canadian War Museum. The expansion is to be completed by 2000.

Toronto megacity mayor-elect Mel Lastman waves to supporters following his victory in the historic Nov. 10 vote. Lastman has made the homeless a priority. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

New Toronto mega-council includes five Jewish members

TORONTO — Jewish candidates did well in the megacity election. Toronto's first unified council will have five Jewish members, while the cities of Markham, Vaughan and Richmond Hill will also enjoy representation from the community.

As expected, both Metro Councillor Howard Moscoe, longtime adversary of mayor-elect Mel Lastman, and North York Councillor Mike Feldman won in Ward 8. They combined to take 70 percent of the ward's vote, beating out Frank Di Giorgio, a North York councillor since 1985. The two veteran winners say their biggest challenge is to get the new megacity to work.

Political veterans also prevailed in Ward 9, where North York councillors Milton Berger and Joanne Flint won 70 percent of ballots. Berger, who has served as Lastman's deputy mayor in North York, has been on council for 20 years. He said transportation and social services will be his priorities. Stuart Weinstein polled nearly 4,000 votes, or nine percent of the total.

Norm Gardner, another longtime Metro councillor and active member of the Jewish community, easily won his seat in Ward 10. He'll represent the area along with North York Councillor John Filion. Gardner campaigned to maintain North York's twice-weekly garbage collection and envied snow removal system.

David Shiner, who's served on North York council for six years, handily won his seat in Ward 12, along with Joan King, who has served the area for 17 years. Lawyer Joel Ginsberg, who has sought election in previous municipal and provincial campaigns, lost badly, picking up just seven percent of votes cast. Shiner said serving on the new council will be "challenging."

Susan Kadis wins in Vaughan

In Ward 23, former Toronto councillor Howard Levine lost to veterans Ila Bossons and John Adams, who in turn beat Councillor Howard Joy. And in Ward 24, candidate Rosie Schwartz was trounced by high-profile winners Olivia Chow and Kyle Rae.

In races for Toronto public school trustees, newcomer Shelley Laskin, a cartographer and education activist, won in Ward 14 with 42 percent of the vote, after an aggressive campaign. In Ward 18, Sheine Mankovsky polled 43 percent of ballots, defeating Arnold Goodman and Lorne Berg, who placed second and third, respectively. And in Ward 20, longtime North York Board of Education trustee Gerri Gershon won easily, with 69 percent of the vote.

One of the bigger upsets in the 905 area came in Vaughan's Ward 5, where longtime Councillor Bernie Green lost to former York Region school trustee Susan Kadis. Kadis narrowly lost to Green in 1994, and this time, squeaked by with a 200-vote plurality. Bandleader Rick Levine polled just seven percent of the votes.

Next door in Vaughan's Ward 4, former school trustee Ted Berger, in a comeback bid, lost to Councillor Mario Racco by over 2,000 votes.

Veteran Markham politician Bill Fisch was successful in his quest to become a regional councillor from the town. In Ward 2, Harvey Goodman, a past president of Shaar Shalom Synagogue, narrowly lost to Councillor Randy Barber.

In Richmond Hill's Ward 3, Councillor David Cohen went unchallenged, while in Ward 6, candidates Richard Sadowski and Cheryl Richman placed respectably, but not enough to defeat Joe DiPaola.

In races for York Region public school trustee, incumbent Harvey Nightingale defeated his nearest rival, Brian Shatsky in Vaughan's wards 4 and 5, while local political activist Howard Shore won in Markham's wards 1 and 2. In Markham's wards 3 and 6, businesswoman Janice Shachter placed third, with 16 percent of the vote.

Jewish War Veterans honor past bravery

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A Remembrance Day ceremony at Beth Tzedec Congregation was marked by the march of the Color Guard, the wail of bagpipes, the call of a bugler playing The Last Post and the trumpeting of the shofar.

About 200 people, mostly seniors, attended the Remembrance Day program honoring veterans for their bravery and the fallen soldiers who gave their lives.

Many veterans, some in full military dress with their medals pinned to their uniforms, were in attendance at the event sponsored by Beth Tzedec Men's Club, the Jewish War Veterans of Canada and the General Wingate Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion.

Keynote speaker Sam Pasternack, national commander of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, spoke passionately about the Jews' exceptional contribution in World War II.

During ceremonies honoring the memory of the six million Holocaust victims, Pasternack called upon the Jewish community to recognize the sacrifices of the Jewish servicemen and women who died.

Veterans go overseas

He said he felt compelled to dispel the myth that Jews did not enlist in World War II, noting that more than 1.5 million Jews of all military ranks "served with distinction" in the Allied armed forces. He stressed that Jews were involved in every type of military operation, from bombing missions to intelligence work.

Pasternack paid tribute to the late Jack Nissen, a war hero who died earlier this month in Toronto. He said Nissen, a British-born radar expert, worked behind enemy lines and made a major contribution to the Allied war effort.

Pasternack cited the efforts of Russian and Polish Jews. He said some 500,000 Jews served in the Soviet forces, where Jewish generals played an important role in defeating the Nazis; an estimated 175,000 Polish Jews defended Poland and/or fought in the Polish army in exile; and 20 Polish Jewish fighter pilots sacrificed their lives in the Battle of Britain.

According to Pasternack, some 500,000 American Jews, 60,000 Jews from the United Kingdom and 33,000 Jews from what was then Palestine were in active service.

He said the percentage of Canadian Jews who enlisted in the military during World War II was higher than the national average. At the time, there were approximately 160,000 Canadian Jews, 17,456 of them, or more than 10 percent of the community, enlisted, he noted.

He said there were 776 casualties; among them, 421 servicemen and women were killed in active service and Canadian Jewish servicemen and women took almost 200 awards for acts of heroism.

The program also included the screening of The 43 Group: The Secret Battle of Britain, a documentary film about the fight against fascism and anti-Semitism in post-war England. The film documents the resistance of a group of English Jews and their gentile friend, led by 43 Jewish ex-servicemen.

Gerry Lambert, one of those ex-servicemen, made a special trip to Toronto to relate his experience.

Rabbi Barry Schneider of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation, who is also chaplain at the Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, urged the Jewish community not to forget the 36 Jewish veterans who are permanent residents at Sunnybrook. He praised the General Wingate Branch for their contribution to Sunnybrook's Jewish veterans.

Other Jewish clergy at the Remembrance Day ceremony were Rabbi Cantor David Bagley, Cantor Paul Kowarsky and Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum.

CJC issues warning over flyers

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is warning Jews and non-Jews alike of flyers claiming that tax deductions may be claimed if kosher products are purchased.

CJC's Ontario region says the flyers pop up every year and are produced by an anti-Semitic group.

The flyers claim that every time a kosher product is bought, a consumer makes a donation "to a Jewish fund."

Because of this "built-in donation," consumers can claim a $500 income tax deduction per year, or $1,500 retroactively over the past three years.

The flyer has a photograph of dozens of kosher products and is headed, "If you buy these products, claim $500 on your income tax."

It is signed by the "United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto," with an address on Beverley Street. The Jewish community's central organizations moved from Beverley Street some 20 years ago.

Another flyer lists all the symbols for kashrut a consumer should look for.

CJC's Bernie Farber says the flyers are meant to stir up confusion when it comes to the purchase of kosher products.

Last March, Revenue Canada issued a statement that the deduction described in the flyers does not exist, and it urged Canadians to ignore them.

The flyers' intent and message was "deeply offensive to the Jewish community and indeed, to all Canadians," Revenue Canada said.

Branson may close earlier than planned

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Branson will have to close its general hospital facilities before the end of 1999 when it is due to become a walk-in medical centre.

Staffing problems are the cause of the early closure, the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario Region executive was told at its recent meeting.

At the same time, Harold Brief said the positive side of the situation is that regional officers have a pledge from North York General Hospital to have language interpreters on every shift and to train its staff to look after the expected increase in elderly Jewish patients from the Branson area.

The executive also heard reports on the thorny issue of the CJC Quebec region's plan to move into a new Jewish community campus in Montreal.

The CJC national officers voted 15 to 4 on Nov. 2 to approve the move in principle.

But Ontario chair Moshe Ronen told The CJN that at the national officers' meeting in Ottawa, an earlier motion to delay the move pending further information was defeated 13 to 10 and he and some others decided for the sake of national unity to approve it in principle.

There is still no decision on whether the national CJC office will move from Montreal to Ottawa, Ronen said.

The motion to delay the move had the support of three former CJC presidents from Ontario, he said.

Jack Silverstone, CJC national executive director, denied in an interview that the Quebec region move is a fait accompli, claiming that there are details about budget, staffing and the national office which must be settled first under the motion approved.

"From our perspective the national organization (I'm not blaming the national officers) did not pay much attention to our concerns," Ronen told the executive.

Silverstone said the Quebec move did not come formally to CJC's attention in time for it to be given full consideration.

"What is disturbing is not so much the insufficient time to consult, but that there was not enough concern for other viewpoints. You cannot hive off the Quebec region from the national office. The CJC is more than just the sum of its parts."

The national CJC position today is "unclear," Silverstone said. "We hope we can strike a deal to please everybody."

At a public meeting which followed, Eli Rosenbaum, head of the war crimes unit for the U.S. government, presented a dramatic account of how his office tracks down Nazi war criminals.

Ronen responded, "I wish we had an Eli Rosenbaum in our justice department."

Hungary's ambassador set to return home

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hungary's ambassador to Canada, Karoly Gedai, will return to Hungary on Nov. 20, about one month after he resigned his posting. Gedai landed in hot water after his letter of congratulations to Imre Finta on his 85th birthday was published in Kanadai Magyarsag, a Hungarian language newspaper based in Toronto.

Details of his letter were quickly picked up in the Hungarian newspaper Kurir, which was followed by a number of Hungarian newspapers publishing descriptions of Finta's activities during World War II, said Istvan Torzsa, minister with the Hungarian Embassy in Ottawa.

Following reports of Gedai's letter, the Hungarian foreign minister instructed the ambassador to apologize, Torzsa said.

Finta was convicted in absentia by a Hungarian court in 1948 of forcibly confining Jewish residents of the city of Szeged in 1944. The detainees were held in squalid conditions before being deported to Auschwitz and forced labor camps in crammed cattle cars, where many died.

Finta faced charges of robbery, forcible confinement, kidnapping and manslaughter in Canada in connection with the events but a jury acquitted him on all counts.

The ambassador sent a letter of apology to Finta, Kanadai Magyarsag, Menorah (a newspaper serving the Hungarian Jewish population in Canada) and to Canadian Jewish Congress explaining that his letter of congratulations to Finta was completed as a routine office matter. The ambassador received a letter from Finta inviting him to attend a birthday party and literary evening organized by a Toronto church in Finta's honor. The ambassador receives from 10 to 15 similar requests every day and his response, congratulating Finta on reaching a milestone event, was also routine, Torzsa said.

"I have committed the mistake not to pay special attention to Mr. Finta's invitation and I let it go through the daily routine," Gedai stated in his letter of apology. "I knew that Finta's past is disputed...but I was unaware of the details and the evidence.

"I would like to underline that I deeply condemn the shameful period of persecution of Jews in Hungarian and world history. I have never maintained relations with those who participated in it and I fully agree with the position of the Hungarian government based on the recognition of the historic grievances and equality of Jewish people."

Jack Silverstone, national executive director of Congress, said "we accept his explanation and...we commend the ambassador for taking responsibility for his actions and doing the honorable thing."

Education Conference: Israel at 50

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — "There's no way you can understand Israel if you don't try to find out what you mean when you say a Jewish state," said the founder and president of the Jerusalem-based Melitz Centres for Jewish-Zionist Education in a keynote address here last week.

Avraham Infeld was speaking to Jewish day school teachers as part of Israel at 50!, a two-day conference for day school and supplementary school teachers sponsored by the Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE) of UJA Federation.

The event, attended by a total of about 1,300 teachers, some from smaller communities in Ontario, was held at Associated Hebrew School's Kamin branch. Infeld, a native of South Africa who made aliyah in 1959, spoke on Israel: A Jewish State or a State for the Jews?

One of the craziest things in Israel, he noted, is that whatever side people take in a debate – whether they're for or against giving up land, or for or against opening theatres on Shabbat – they justify their arguments by saying, "We are in a Jewish state."

To have meaning as a Jewish state, Israel has to know "how to find its roots in the past, but at the same time it has to be a home to different types of Jews."

Teaching about Israel, said Infeld, is "so complicated and so difficult that we usually allow it to be taught by Chief Rabbi CNN."

Among Israel's roles has been the saving of Jewish refugees and being "a warehouse of memories," as well as a source of pride for Jews "in being a people, not only a religion."

The teacher's job is "not to teach kids that Israel is our favorite charity, but to teach the importance and the centrality of Israel to Jewish life – and all its problems," said Infeld. "You cannot teach identity today without a relationship to ...Israel, and Israel is not going to help you teach a simplistic, childish [way of] being Jewish."

Life in Israel can be "both magnificent and hell," he noted.

Political issues such as whether Israel will "become an integral part of a new Middle East," are among the issues facing the country.

Most of Infeld's own Jewish teachers were "lousy," he recalled. "They stood up in front of me and gave me answers to questions I never asked. Education is not only supplying answers, it's knowing how to provoke questions."

By provoking questions, teachers will make their answers relevant, he explained. Israel provokes questions of Jewish identity, morality, and values, he noted.

Israel has to be "for all Jews at the same time, a reflection of their dreams and an answer to their identity.

"I turn to the Jewish people around the world and say, 'Understand the struggle Israel's going through.'"

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

THORNHILL — One of the great tragedies in Jewish education is that educators have not used Israel as a greater resource, says a professor of education at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

"The gift of Israel exists, but the Jewish people have not dealt with it. We have not made the idea of going to Israel the centrepoint of our lives," Barry Chazan, currently a visiting professor at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America told supplementary Hebrew school teachers at a recent professional development day affiliated with Toronto Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation. The workshops formed part of a two-day conference on Israel at 50.

Chazan, who opened the day-long workshop, said one of several reasons it is important to teach Israel is that it is the place where Jews and their religion were born. "Israel is the cradle of our civilization. There is only one country that can be considered our homeland."

As well, he said, Israel is related to the notion of a better world. "Israel symbolizes the idea that we can improve the world and the lives of Jews...It is about the struggle to survive after the Holocaust and about the fact that we have succeeded. Israel is an achievement in technology, culture, medicine and Jewish studies. It [is a symbol] of the renaissance of the Jewish people."

Israel, said Chazan, is not only a contemporary modern society, but also a place "where the air over Jerusalem is saturated with prayers and dreams. It is a complicated country with diverse views, whose life since 1948 has been shaped by wars."

Some of the goals in teaching Israel, Chazan told teachers, should be to instil a curiosity in students. "They are curious about a place where dogs and cats speak Hebrew and where kids go into the army. We also have to try and project a nurturing and caring for Zion. We need to create a caring for Zion gene."

He said it is important to emphasize contemporary Israel. "We need to teach students that Israel is alive, modern and real. It is about people – a country of human beings. Meeting people is a critical dimension of teaching Israel."

Israel also has to be connected to the Hebrew language, said Chazan. "We should be making Hebrew a living thing. Now is the time to link Hebrew and Israel. It is time to reunite the two partners that go together. Hebrew and Israel deserve to be man and wife.

"Israel is about issues such as pluralism, politics, making peace and about Arabs. These issues as well, are part of what we should be [talking about.] We should also be talking about miracles and dreams. Israel's political parties are rooted in great dreams."

When studying Israel, he said, teachers should be making use of poetry, current newspapers and novels. "It is not a textbook subject – it is a non-ending story."

Chazan stressed that a critical aspect of an educator's role is to "turn around the sad fact that young people do not see going to Israel as an exciting fact. Going to Israel is the most powerful experience a young person has by the time they are 19 or 20."

Workshops offered to the teachers included Ten Easy Steps to Teaching Israel, Rabbinic Commentaries on Israel, Torah Text on Israel, Wake up and Experience Israel and Teaching Hebrew Mechanical Reading in the Supplementary School: Pros and Cons.

Deja vu

The despot in Baghdad has once again set a vainglorious course toward a possibly deadly brink. Last week, he expelled all American weapons inspectors serving in Iraq as part of the United Nations-directed special commission charged with overseeing the destruction of Iraq's biological, chemical and nuclear weaponry. In response, the leader of the inspection team immediately announced that the entire group would be leaving Iraq.

Saddam's plan is not complicated. He is exploiting the apparent diminished resolve among Security Council members for continued forceful pressure against his country, as well as the increased resolve among fellow Arab states to once again wave pan-Arab colors. He aims to embarrass the United States, loosen the grip of the western embargo on his economy and keep Israelis nervous.

As of this writing, the United Nations has not yet reacted to Saddam's latest provocation, but "serious consequences" were promised in response to his flagrant violations of the inspection agreement.

Saddam Hussein is evil. He flouts international law. He holds in mocking contempt the rules of civility and civilization. He holds in utter disdain the value of human life. Human beings are but an instrument he plays to achieve his own ruthless, detestable aims. Even now he has moved scores of Iraqi families, men, women and children, into his palace to act as de facto shields against the possibility of United Nations sanctioned air strikes.

The CJN urges the government of Canada to support the strongest measures possible against the government of Iraq. He no longer makes any pretense to hide the fact that he is building new weapons of mass destruction for imminent use against his "enemies." Canada should be part of the effort to stop him in his tracks.

More deja vu

Throughout the Arab world, the "street' has rallied in support of Saddam Hussein. The Gulf War coalition of Arab states, which was bound by nothing stronger than the twine of expediency, has quickly unravelled. There have been demonstrations supportive of Iraq in Cairo and in other Arab countries.

There were also demonstrations in the West Bank and Gaza. In an eerie, eye-opening but stomach-turning repeat of their rooftop exhortations during the Gulf War, many Palestinians shrieked their support of Iraq's belligerency. As if the clock had been turned back to the heart-stopping nights of the scud missiles some six years ago, the demonstrators in Ramallah shouted: "Oh Saddam my dear, drop your bombs on Tel Aviv."

After seeing the images of the frenzied mass of demonstrators burning flags, marching and chanting in unison their death wish for the people of Israel, it is hard to imagine any Israeli feeling kindly disposed toward his Palestinian neighbors. It is harder still to imagine any Israeli whose confidence in the peace process is not quickly eroding as a result of this latest Palestinian dance of death,

Good luck mayor

The CJN extends its congratulations to Mel Lastman, the first mayor of new, (mega) Toronto. Last week, Lastman defeated Barbara Hall for the position. He will now preside over the fifth largest municipal government in North America. His council of 57 elected members will be, undoubtedly, at times an impossibly unruly group. He will therefore need strength, stamina, patience, wisdom, initiative, compassion and a sense of humor to govern City Hall. May God grant it to him. Good luck, Mayor Mel.

Absil did not speak for board on Gedenkdienst

You recently published a letter from Walter Absil (CJN, Nov. 6) concerning the project known as Gedenkdienst at the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre. Absil is certainly entitled to his opinion regarding this controversial matter. However, his comments do not represent the official position of the Board of Governors and he had no right to sign his letter in this misleading manner.

What is a Jew – the crucial point

The current crisis surrounding the Netanyahu government's proposed legislation that would grant exclusive conversion powers to Israel's Orthodox rabbinate is about more than who is a Jew. Partisan name calling and finger pointing, such as Richie Cohen's letter "Israel has right to say who is a Jew" (CJN, Nov. 6), persist, as if pluralism and diversity were someone's fault. According to Cohen, the Conservative and Reform "movements are responsible for creating the crisis. They have to pay the consequences."

Sadly, this type of thinking, which characterizes fundamentalist thought in all corners of the Jewish world, only violates and weakens the soul of the Jewish people by confusing tradition for truth, and by perpetuating the myth that the State of Israel and Judaism are one and the same.

Writes Cohen: "Israel has every right to define who, and how one is a Jew, since they [sic] are the Jewish state." I assume, therefore, that were a democratically elected Knesset to decide in future that the only "real" Jews were those of white Ashkenazi origin or those who "believe in God," that Cohen would unequivocally accept such a decision as both binding and halachically valid.

The point is not who is a Jew but what is a Jew. Those on all sides of the spectrum who refuse to unconditionally recognize and dialogue with their fellow Jews have forgotten that individual differences of opinion or ideology notwithstanding, we remain one people, bound together by a shared and complex history, religion, culture and destiny. Perhaps those, such as Cohen, who feel compelled to attack the legitimacy of their fellow Jews, might devote some of their energy to learning more about the roots and purposes of different schools of thought, with the aim of building more trust and understanding in our fragile Jewish world.

Ultimately, our task as Jews is not to judge the legitimacy of others, but to focus our precious energy on what, as Jews, is expected of us now as human beings and members of the Jewish people, including our obligation to look after each other.

Being a Jew is both national and spiritual

The New Israel Fund confuses democracy with "free will" and with the values which truly unite all Jews as one people.

Israel allows all Jews to practise their Judaism as they choose. They may observe (or not observe) Shabbat, holidays, kashrut, according to their own beliefs. They may pray and learn in a variety of synagogues in Israel. What the government is concerned with is the delegation of authority of determining who is a Jew. Such decisions may not be made by a "democratic" vote as if we are running a social club to which we wish to admit our friends.

G-d chose the Jews to be His people to fulfil the commandments of the Torah and to be a light unto the nations. As King, He gave each of us "free will" to decide how we may or may not fulfil these commands. He did not give us a free vote to decide who will be a part of the Jewish people.

Being Jewish is a "national" definition, as well as a spiritual one. A person is a Jew by being born to a Jewish mother. We are a part of the Jewish people because we have been given a Jewish neshamah (soul). Whether or not, or how, one chooses to observe Jewish laws and customs does not determine one's status as a Jew. A Jew is always a part of the Jewish people.

We may become a part of the Jewish people by accepting our spiritual heritage, through the process of conversion. In order to become a part of G-d's chosen people, we must follow His definitions and standards as given to us in the Torah (both written and oral). That is why only halachically acceptable conversions can be accepted by Israel.

As Jews we may choose how we practise our Judaism. We may not vote on who is a Jew.

Israeli resident searches for aunt

Margalit Rosenblat, a resident of Ramat Ishay, a small town in northern Israel is searching for her aunt, Miriam, the only remaining sibling of her father, Menachem Mendel Kirshenbaum. Both managed to escape from the Nazis, but were separated following their liberation in Poland.

Yad Vashem was able to find a record of Miriam stating that she moved to Canada in October 1948, where it is believed she lived with an uncle, possibly in Toronto or Montreal. The uncle, apparently the owner of a large chain of clothing stores, may have changed his name to Kirsch or Karsh. He moved to Canada before 1920 from Kielce, Poland.

Isadore Twersky combined tradition, modernity

Other-worldly figure was a Harvard institution

By GIL TROY

Isadore Twersky, Harvard professor and chassidic rebbe, died on Oct. 12, the day after Yom Kippur. It is fitting to record the death of Harvard University's Nathan Littauer Professor of Hebrew Literature and Philosophy in both secular time and Jewish time, for the life of this rationalist medieval scholar and mystical Talner Rebbe combined great secular achievements with a dynamic commitment to Jewish tradition.

Twersky was a mythical figure to generations of Harvard's Jewish students. An otherworldly figure with a long flowing beard and piercing eyes, he was a Harvard institution. This class of 1952 graduate and 1956 PhD spent his entire career in the most hallowed halls of academe without going native. He taught hundreds of students a popular core course in medieval philosophy centred on Maimonides. Yet he was not your typical professor. The impressive careers of his many assimilated Jewish colleagues showed just how far modern American Jews could go in becoming one of "them." His career showed just how impressively a Jew could succeed while remaining one of us.

As an undergraduate, I was terrified of Twersky. Once during the two-week "shopping period" at the start of a semester, when students sampled various courses, I attended one of his lectures. A required course being given at the same time would prevent me from taking the class, but I wanted to see the great man up close. I marvelled as the famous rabbi-professor floated into the room, and in one all-but-invisible fluid motion whisked off his fedora and placed a plain black kippah on his head. Dispensing with the usual pleasantries modern professors use to entice and entertain their students-cum-consumers, trusting us to figure out the mechanics by consulting his syllabus, Twersky began lecturing in a low, somewhat muffled voice. Surprisingly, his native New England "ahhrrs" and perfect diction made him sound more like Jack Kennedy than Jackie Mason.

About 10 minutes into the lecture, as so often happened during shopping period, a student entered the room. The door creaked loudly as it swung shut; Twersky stopped his lecture, looked up and stared at the door with his piercing eyes. I thought the door was going to wilt.

Two years later, as a graduate student preparing for oral examinations in four different historical fields, I found myself in Twersky's office. I wanted to prepare a field in modern Jewish history, but Harvard's two modern Jewish historians were on leave. I asked Twersky, as chair of the department of Near Eastern Languages and Civilizations – Harvard's code word for Jewish studies – what he suggested I do.

"Do you have any background for studying modern Jewish history," he asked.

Feeling extraordinarily inadequate, I explained that I had taken a few courses as an undergraduate but had read extensively on my own.

"Do you have any languages," he asked.

Stretching only a bit, I replied "Hebrew."

What about German or Yiddish, he asked.

When I said no, he nodded gravely. "Historians need to read things in the original."

Twersky was famous for imposing years of preparation on his graduate students, only allowing them to begin their PhD once they had mastered Hebrew, Aramaic, Yiddish and/or German, depending on their particular fields.

I was sure that I was about to get the brush-off, when he muttered, "This is highly irregular, and not my field, but graduate training is important." He paused for a long time. "You can read scholarly work in Hebrew?" he asked again.

"Yes," I insisted.

"Then I'll take you on."

I left the meeting shell-shocked. This was more than I had bargained for. Besides, what did he know about modern Jewish history? He was a medievalist.

My friends were equally surprised when I told them about the meeting. "Did you wear a kippah when you met with him?" one friend asked.

"Did you tell him, the Talner Rebbe, that your grandfather was a Talner Chassid?" another wondered.

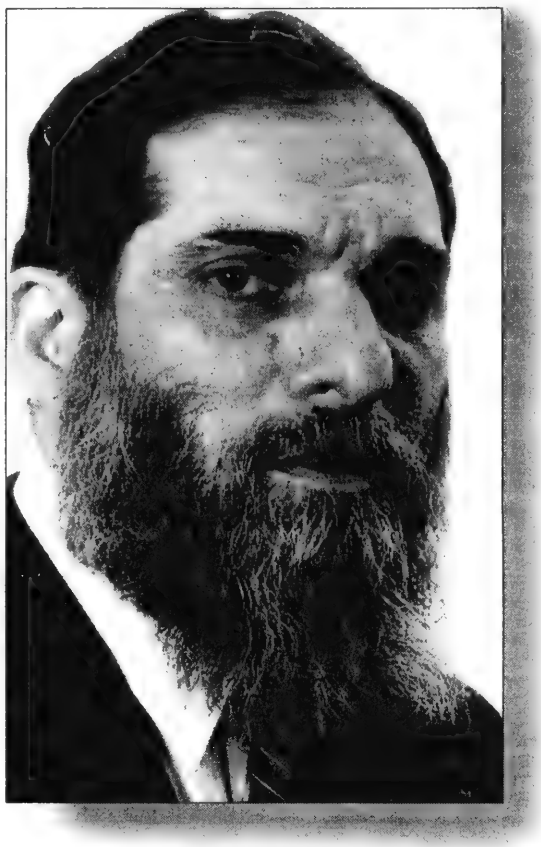
I explained that our relationship was a secular one, and strictly business. I was approaching him as a scholar not a rabbi, as my professor not my rebbe.

Preparation for orals entailed monthly meetings and a reading list of approximately 100 books in each field, all culminating in a two-hour exam where each of four professors had a half-hour to grill you about any aspect of their particular field.

During the meetings, one professor expected you to come in, ask whatever questions you had, then leave. Another subjected you to a barrage of historiographical questions similar to what he would ask during the exam. Twersky was more subtle – and more involved. He helped set my intellectual agenda by suggesting one book here, another book there, always offhandedly but never gratuitously. He would pose broad yet incisive questions that made the material come alive in ways I never expected.

Looking back on my notes, I am struck by how much he shaped my understanding of the period without ever lecturing me. And I learned early on that this medievalist had a strong – and quite convincing – interpretation of modern Jewish history.

Most scholars treat modern Jewish history as a series of intellectual and ideological clashes: between Chassidim and Mitnagdim, between the Reform and the Orthodox, between Zionists and anti-Zionists. Twersky felt that this approach overemphasized fights between the intellectuals and ignored the more integrated lives of the overwhelmingly traditional masses. Just as his life was a series of "ands" rather than "either/ors," so too his scholarship emphasized continuities, points of contact, areas of overlap, rather than viewing modernity and tradition as being inherently opposed to one another. Twersky alerted me to the ways in which tradition and modernity interacted, cross-fertilized, thrived together.



Isadore Twersky

Twersky certainly harbored strong feelings about the secularist and anti-religious bias of most modern scholars, but he never harangued. He preferred to rely on an aside here, a bibliographic suggestion there, all of which gave me the joy of discovery. Responding to his cues, I reinvented his wheel, I discovered his world view and considered it my own – with modifications and my own variations,of course.

During the pleasantries we always exchanged at the start of our meetings, I gradually worked up the courage to wish him a Shanah Tovah or a Chag Samayach, as the occasion warranted. Still, I could never bring myself to tell him about our shared Talner connection. First, I feared I would ruin our scholarly distance. Next, I felt inadequate, fearing that he would disapprove of my great distance from his way of life. By the time I discovered how open, how tolerant, how gracious he was, I had missed my chance. I had gone so long without sharing the information, I could see no smooth way to bring it up. As a result, I never shared a Shabbat with him at his table. I never allowed myself to risk our established relationship by creating a newer and fuller one.

During our second meeting, I made a little joke and got him to laugh. As his face dissolved into a smile his formidable eyes lit up. I felt good and realized that he was not so intimidating, but rather that I was intimidated. I, like so many students, was the one making the interaction stiff and formal.

As we progressed through the modern era, I also gained some insight into his four decades as Harvard's most Jewishly flamboyant Jew. While becoming an essential part of the institution, he always remained an outsider. He noted that even his most scrupulous colleagues often consulted him about any number of biblical, Hebraic or Judaic questions rather than looking things up themselves, treating Jewish concerns as trivial arcana rather than scholarly matters worth mastering on their own.

When I finally had my oral exam, Twersky met two of my professors for the first time – despite the fact that one had spent his entire career at Harvard and the other had been there for 20 years. And he counselled me to avoid being an American Jewish historian: "Don't adulterate yourself," he said. "If you want to be an American historian, don't tackle any Jewish topics early in your career; otherwise you'll be ghettoized by them as a Jewish scholar, rather than as an American scholar."

In his advice, I felt I could hear the disdain his own work had suffered from more "worldly" colleagues.

Clearly, Twersky had been marginalized at times during his career. Still, all in all, his was a remarkable feat. In an age of polarization, his life was a monument to integration. He could be a Maimonidean rationalist and a chassidic mystic; a critical scholar and a deep believer, a Harvard man and a man of the cloth.

Twersky sought to integrate and unite rather than to polarize and divide our Jewish community. He was no religious zealot shutting out the world – or the heathens – surrounding him. He was no political propagandist haranguing his students to accept his ideas. Rather, he was a great teacher, a balanced individual and a thoroughly modern traditional Jew, who mastered the secular and the religious, showing that we do not always have to choose between the two worlds, but can take the best from each of them.

Travel agents a tough sell

I surf the Internet daily looking for Jewish and Israeli news. Every week, I come across three or four articles dealing with tourism in Israel.

By Viva Press in Halifax

Many hotels and tourist agencies promote discounted fares and trips. While the travel agencies may make such offers, how many travel agents themselves have actually visited Israel? How much do they know about the land of milk and honey? Not as much as they should.

Despite the easy border crossings available between Israel and Jordan or Egypt, press releases in Israel suggest there has been a significant drop in tourism in Israel.

Recently, I was at a travel show in Halifax helping Toronto-based Israel Government Tourist Office director Arie Shevy-Shibi promote Tel Aviv as the location for a conference to take place in June 1998.

Many of the travel agents were interested in visiting Israel. Most of them wanted to float in the Dead Sea. They wanted to visit Jesus's birthplace and see all the Christian sites. They wanted to visit this historical land. They wanted to visit this small country that has made big news.

But a number of them were scared off by some of the big news out of Israel.

Flipping through a pamphlet on the Dead Sea, one woman told me she really wanted to go there, but was too afraid because of the "unstable situation" in Israel. I told her I had been to Israel a number of times. I told her Israel is a safe place to visit. I told her the likelihood of being caught in a terrorist attack is very small. I told her more than three million tourists visit Israel each year and about 40 percent of them are returnees.

Then she told me she was afraid because of what she'd read and heard in the media. She said the media always show how scary it is to be in Israel.

As a journalist, I know the media can blow things out of proportion.

I explained to her how a minor incident in Israel becomes a major happening when it is reported from an outside perspective. She was skeptical. After all, I was at this travel show to promote Israel, why would I say negative things about it?

So I asked if she had ever been to Italy. She had. We talked about the moped drivers there and how crazy they are. I told her I thought I stood a better chance of getting hit by a moped in Italy than of being in a terrorist attack in Israel.

After all, misfortunes can happen wherever you are.

The woman as well as other fearful travel agents asked me what it was like in Israel. I told them Israel is a unique place. No matter where you travel, you'll never find a place quite like it. It's a place that has to be visited in person, I explained, which is probably the reason so many people return to visit again and again.

At the end of the day, we had spoken to many people. We had given out maps of Israel as well as pamphlets on Tel Aviv and the Dead Sea. I don't think all the agents will go to the conference in Israel.

However, I do think they left with a new perspective of Israel. And, they left with Dead Sea mud caked on their hands from the sample bucket Shevy-Shibi brought with him.

U2 gets fans thinking

As the winter season began to wind down last March, the legendary Irish rock band U2 announced the dates for their world Pop Mart tour. To my great pleasure, this tour was to include a stop at the Olympic Stadium in Montreal. When the tickets went on sale, several friends and I got together to spend the night in front of the box office in anticipation.

By Justin Korda in Montreal

Once I had the tickets, I had to wait eight months before I could see the band perform. For 32 weeks, a day did not go by without my anxiously looking forward to Nov. 2, the night scheduled for the concert at the Big O.

Well Nov. 2 has since come and gone and it was a brilliant show. We saw and felt the power of music, with its correlative emotions, motivation and enthusiasm.

The show was not just a simple concert. It was an extravagant, commercially-oriented spectacle of technology, modern art, sound and lights.

At one point during the show, my friend turned to me and said "I have never felt music like this before." That, I suppose, would be the most accurate description of the U2 Pop Mart tour.

After the show, some pressing questions came to mind. How could a band like U2, traditionally known for its deep commitment to social causes such as the environment and human rights, be capable of creating such an extravagant, materialistic, superficial and profit-guzzling tour? On the surface, it seemed hypocritical. However, upon closer examination, I believe there was a deeper message.

The Pop Mart tour includes many elements that can be found in our modern society. Our culture has a tremendous fixation on superficiality and materialism. The widespread use of media and marketing emphasize our "more is better" philosophy. The U2 production used the materialistic elements in such an exaggerated manner that the spectator was almost forced to question the legitimacy of the underlying message. By numbing their audience with an all-out attack on the senses, the band prompted us to ponder the implications of the superficiality of American pop culture, a phenomenon that has taken over our society.

As a fan, I would like to believe that it was the band's intention to exaggerate the cruel, materialistic elements of society, in an effort to cause us to think about how ridiculous and out-of-whack our priorities are. I realize that many people would reject this argument, but for me that is the essence of the band's brilliance. They send a potent message that delineates the absurdities in our society, make huge profits on their music and merchandise, yet still ensure that every person leaves the show feeling completely satisfied.

For us "idealistic" students who rant and rage about changing the system and bringing about justice, U2 offers some advice.

Today's "establishment" or mainstream has a very strong structure. Those who are intent on changing this system from the outside might be destined for failure. On the other hand, trying to change the "establishment" from within might be a more successful route.

U2 chose to exaggerate and over-emphasize the ludicrous values of our society in order to get people to realize its ridiculousness. In essence, they used the system to suggest that its very foundations should be changed. In the same way, we have to learn what makes our society tick in order to make changes.

There is much meaning to be found in those who travel in Mysterious Ways to attain their goals.

A New Lexicon of Hate

Anti-Semitism is not a subject that is high on the list of Canadian Jews. Once upon a time, we were literally consumed with it. It was natural when Nazism was in full bloom and, for a while, threatened to engulf the western world. But since then, anti-Semitism has been in steady decline. The majority of people in North America say that they would not be unhappy if their children married Jews (a sentiment which, in reverse, seems to be embraced by more and more Jewish people as well).

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

As for Jews, therefore, anti-Semitism has moved off the main agenda of their lives, and that is a blessing. But it hasn't gone away and has become – as its nature seems to demand – a gentile problem. I say this, not because gentiles are more prone to meshugas than Jews, but because this particular affliction appears as a recurring sore on the body politic of the general population.

This was brought to my attention recently and most cogently when I was sent a fascinating pamphlet entitled A New Lexicon of Hate, with the subtitle "Changing Tactics, Language and Symbols of America's Extremists." It is published by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles and contains primarily American facts. Canadians should not feel badly about this, because on the whole, the impact of such extremist groups is smaller in Canada than the United States.

It has been known for a long time that extremism and violence germinate and surface more easily in the United States than here. There are more people there, and the tradition of being able to bear arms has a kind of sacred character which, on the whole, I find blessedly absent in Canada.

What follows is a very small excerpt from the Wiesenthal pamphlet, which brought me many facts and figures with which hitherto I had been unfamiliar.

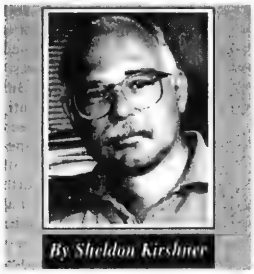
For instance, there is such a thing as a "racist code." Jews familiar with their own tradition know that the Hebrew alphabet is also used for numerical purposes – aleph standing for 1, beit for 2. Apparently, gentile racists have been attracted by this system and I learned that in it, a equals 1, b equals 2, and so on; 8 equals h. Therefore, 88 equals HH and this number now stands amongst the racist for "Heil Hitler," used as a greeting for nearly all racists. AI is represented by 19, and 19 represents "Aryan identity," and so on.

The racists also have their own calendar with preferred dates on which they urge their own supporters to attend public gatherings, protest rallies and the like. Chief amongst these dates is of course Adolf Hitler's birthday (April 20), and "a perfect day" for protest is the birthday of Martin Luther King Jr. – for its own obvious reason, but also because a former U.S. Nazi leader, Robert J. Mathews, was born on the same day.

This is a small selection from the 30-page pamphlet, which is brilliantly illustrated and thoroughly convincing. Copies may be obtained from headquarters of the centre: 9760 West Pico Blvd., Los Angeles, Calif. 90035, or from the Simon Wiesenthal branch in Canada: 8 King St. E., Suite 710, Toronto M5C 1B5.

The Kirshner File

The extraordinary story of Shlomo Perel



By Sheldon Kirshner

Shlomo Perel, alias Josef Perjell, professes to be amazed himself. "It seems like a dream, four years to have lived among Nazi enemies without documents and papers," he said with a touch of incredulity. "But when I meet my former comrades from the Hitler Youth and the Wehrmacht, it is proof it was reality."

Perel, a 72-year-old retired Israeli businessman, was once a poseur par excellence, a Jew who masqueraded as a German in the interests of self-preservation. By all accounts, Perel, who had once dreamed of being an actor, performed brilliantly. He was the ideal Aryan poster boy.

Perel's story, told in the 1990 award-winning film Europa, Europa, is so extraordinary that it had to be verified by two mass-circulation German magazines, Stern and Der Spiegel.

Born in Peine, a town near Hannover, he was the son of Azriel and Rifka Perel, east European Jews who had settled in Germany after World War I.

In 1935, two years after Hitler's accession to power, the Perels fled to Poland. With the outbreak of World War II, they presciently sent their sons, Shlomo and David, eastward. The siblings were separated, and Perel, perhaps like Jerzy Kosinski in the surrealistic novel The Painted Bird, was forced to fend for himself as a displaced person in Soviet-occupied Poland, the birthplace of his father.

As related in his memoirs, upon which Europa, Europa is based, Perel enrolled in a Young Communist school cum-orphanage in Grodno. With Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941, the orphanage was bombed, and Perel was on the road again.

Falling into the hands of the victorious Wehrmacht, Perel, perfectly fluent in German, convinced the company commander that he was Josef Perjell, an ethnic German from Lithuania, where his mother had been born. Charmed by the boy, the troops adopted him as a mascot and Russian-language interpreter. He served for a year, and during this period he helped to interrogate a captured Soviet soldier named Jacob Djugashvilli, Josef Stalin's older son, and survived a battle in which he was mistakenly celebrated as a hero.

Impressed by him, the company commander, Joachim von Munchow, an ardent Nazi, adopted Perel as a son, and placed him in an elite Hitler Youth academy in Brunswick, close to Peine.

"I had to adjust myself very quickly to this dangerous environment," said Perel, who was recently in Toronto for Holocaust Education Week as a guest of Canadian Young Judaea. "I had to forget Shloimeleh to survive. I had to go as far away as possible from Shloilmeleh."

At the academy, a training centre for future Nazi leaders, Perel was subjected to a barrage of ideological indoctrination which turned on virulent anti-Semitism and the claim that Germans formed a master race. "The hatred against Jews was deeply internalized," recalled Perel, a slight, balding, kindly figure with sallow skin whose halting English resonates of German and Hebrew.

Although, as a Jew, he never felt self-loathing, Perel was mesmerized by the atmosphere. "I was sure Germany would win the war. We were totally brainwashed. We stood in awe of the fuhrer. Hitler was a god. I lived a classic schizophrenic existence."

Being circumcised, Perel went to great lengths to conceal his private parts, cowering in the shower and even refusing to sleep with a girlfriend who wanted to have babies for the fuhrer.

Despite his efforts at obliterating his real identity, he was unmasked by two German acquaintances, but they did not betray him. "They gave me human life," said Perel.

There were also moments when he almost succumbed to despair. One such crisis occurred when he visited the Lodz ghetto, where his parents were imprisoned. Perel had convinced the academy that his imaginary Christian parents, with whom he had supposedly lost touch, might still be alive in Grodno. Slipping out of Grodno, he went to Lodz, spending 12 days there at the end of 1943 and at the beginning of 1944 without ever tracking down Azriel and Rifka. As it happened, they died in the summer of 1944, he in the ghetto and she in a concentration camp.

During his darkest days in the ghetto, Perel never forgot his mother's last words in Yiddish, "Shloimeleh, live." She uttered this admonition just before her sons fled into the Soviet zone in Poland. "Whenever I was in trouble, I heard these words in my mind's eye. They shaped my will to live."

When the war ended, Perel was reunited with his brother. They never had any intention of rebuilding their lives in Germany. "When I read that the War of Independence had begun, I decided to go to Israel."

Perel arrived in July 1948, in time to fight with the Haganah in Jerusalem under the command of a young officer, Moshe Dayan. After being demobilized, he settled down, married and earned a living as a metal worker. In 1970, he and David opened a zipper factory in Tel Aviv. They sold the plant in 1984, following Perel's heart bypass surgery.

While recuperating, Perel, the father of two sons and a grandfather twice over, wrote his memoirs in Hebrew. The publication of the French version coincided with the premiere of Europa, Europa in Paris. The film, directed by Agnieszka Holland, won the Golden Globe prize for best foreign language movie at the Berlin Film Festival and was an Oscar nominee for best adapted screenplay. Perel, who co-wrote the script with Holland, claims that Europa, Europa has had a greater impact on German youth than Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List.

Despite, or because of, his experiences, Perel visits Germany on student lecture tours quite regularly. He is not anti-German, steadfastly rejecting the notion of collective guilt. As he put it, "The young generation is not responsible for the Holocaust." Nevertheless, he subscribes to American scholar Daniel Goldhagen's thesis, in Hitler's Willing Executioners, that the German people, inculcated by centuries of anti-Semitism, participated as faceless bureaucrats and as brutal killers in the Final Solution. "It's a serious, authoritative work about the German national character," he observed, referring to Goldhagen's controversial book.

Intriguingly enough, Perel maintains a relationship, albeit an ambivalent one, with about a dozen of the Germans he befriended in the Wehrmacht and in the Hitler Youth school. One of them still harbors Nazi sympathies.

It's plain that the subject unsettles Perel. "They are not my friends," he said, "but they shared my destiny for four years. Maybe they are a little angry that they never knew I was Jewish. It was too fantastic that, in such a clear Aryan place, there could have been a Jew."

Von Munchow, the Wehrmacht commander who took a shine to Perel, died in 1987 without ever realizing that his protege was Jewish. "Had he known, he would have executed me."

As a survivor, Perel, a soft-spoken man, displays a surprising lack of bitterness. He cannot accept the eye-for-an-eye philosophy of vengeance which animates some survivors. "I learned from Martin Buber that we have no right to be inhuman because we were persecuted."

Perel, who embraces values of peace, brotherly love and tolerance, was shocked when he heard a lecture at Holocaust Education Week in which a speaker vented animosity toward all gentiles.

"This is irresponsible. Holocaust Education Week can't be a stage for chauvinism."

Discovering one's identity

By RABBI LAWRENCE ENGLANDER

It is commonplace these days to say that "every Jew is a Jew by choice." Growing up in an open society, being born Jewish is no guarantee that one will continue to live as a Jew or raise Jewish children. It is our choice whether or not to do so. Is there any secret ingredient that may help to tip the balance toward Jewish identity?

This week's Torah portion, Chayey Sarah, may shed some light on this question. Abraham sends his servant to find a wife for Isaac. When the servant returns with Rebecca, Isaac sees them from afar. "Isaac was meditating in the field at evening time and, looking up, he saw camels approaching" (Gen. 24:63). This is the first mention of Isaac in the Torah since he had been offered up as a sacrifice on Mount Moriah (in Gen. 22). Where had he been since that time?

According to one midrash, Abraham actually went through with the slaughter of his son. Isaac's soul ascended to heaven, where it lingered for three years until Rebecca was chosen for his wife; then God restored Isaac's soul to him and placed him on the path to meet his intended wife.

The text itself suggests another possibility. In the verse before the one quoted above, we learn that Isaac was coming from the direction of Be'er Lachai Ro'i, a settlement in the Negev region. This place name is mentioned only once before in Torah (Gen. 16:14); it is the place where Hagar and Ishmael went, after Abraham and Sarah expelled them from their home. Is it possible that Isaac spent the intervening three years with the brother from whom his parents took pains to shield him? Was his return home a sign that he was willing to make peace with his father, that he shared Abraham's desire to continue the covenant with God into future generations?

We return to our original question about Jewish identity. I have met many individuals (usually male) who tell me, "Everything I hate about Judaism I learned in Hebrew school." In their adult years, they are still wondering if there is anything worthwhile in Jewish tradition for them to return to.

Like Isaac, these people have come into conflict with a parent figure — or a tradition — whom they perceive as authoritarian and out of touch. As soon as they are able to escape, perhaps after their bar/bat mitzvah, they seek refuge in the tents of their gentile neighbors to broaden their cultural horizons. As the years pass, their Jewish education fades in their memory so that they become more fluent in the Anglo-Saxon language and heritage than they are in their own. Is there any route back from the Moriah of their Jewish alienation?

Abraham provides half the answer: He seeks a wife for his son and beckons Isaac to return home to develop a new, adult relationship with his father and his tradition. This opportunity is available to our ambivalent people today, in several forms. Find a community where you feel at home — there are enough synagogues, minyanim and chavurot to offer a wide range of choice. Take one of the many courses in Judaism offered in your neighborhood. Lend a hand toward the many endeavors of charity and social justice in which Jewish communities are engaged.

But even this is only half the answer. The rest must come from Isaac himself. Seeking a fulfilling relationship with the Jewish people is certainly one route to strengthening our Jewish identity. But for those of you who are seeking the way back for your children, or for yourself, perhaps you might also consider the journey within, the journey that leads us toward God.

In the solitude of the desert, Isaac probed the depth of his soul to discover the eternal flame that burns within the Jewish people. Only then was he able to look ahead and perceive his destiny. We become the heirs of Isaac's quest. In order to inherit its treasure, we must repeat it in our own lifetime.

Observers of the Jewish world sometimes hypothesize that the current popularity of Jewish genealogy reflects a widespread need among Jews to discover not only their ancestral roots, but their religious roots as well.

Tracing one's family tree, the sociologically minded might suggest, is merely a secular aspect of the religious baal tshuvah movement. The object of both, supposedly, is a reconciliation and a return to knowledge that had been forgotten, abandoned or lost.

Twenty years ago last month, a group of Jewish genealogists in the New York City area established the first Jewish genealogical society in the post-Holocaust era. Participants of that first historic meeting, which took place in the Elizabeth, N.J. home of Dr. Neil Rosenstein, reads like a Who's Who of Jewish Genealogy. Besides Rosenstein, attendees included Arthur Kurzweil, Dan Rottenberg, Steven Siegel and Rabbi Malcolm Stern – each of whom has contributed a major book or treatise to the field.

The seeds sown by these pioneers found fertile ground. Today more than 60 Jewish genealogical societies are active around the world, with new societies emerging regularly in remote places like Vilnius and Kazakhstan.

It was a drawing of an outspread majestic tree, neatly adorned with crests of the 12 tribes of Israel, that was the logo of the Gesellshaft für Jüdische Familien-Forschung, the only notable pre-war society devoted to the serious study of Jewish family history. Headquartered in Berlin, the society published a scholarly German-language bulletin, the Jüdische Familien-Forschung, from December 1924 to September 1938. In November 1938, the shattered glass of Kristallnacht likely jammed the presses, and no further editions ever appeared.

An early precursor of this ill-fated Gesellshaft and of the modern Jewish genealogical movement was the Society for Jewish Culture and Learning that Yomtov Lipmann (Leopold) Zunz established in 1819.

The first breezes of the Jewish Enlightenment had blown across Europe in the 1780s. In the early 1800s, Napoleon was eager to export his nation's cherished ideals of liberty, equality and brotherhood across Europe, even if it meant including the Jews and other traditional outsiders in this grand egalitarian scheme.

Napoleon was not averse to the idea, but wondered whether the Jews would make loyal citizens. To answer that question, he reconvened the Sanhedrin, the ancient Jewish high court that had not been in session since the destruction of the Second Temple. At his behest, 112 Jewish notables, including powerful businessmen, financiers, rabbis and scholars, convened a congress in Paris in 1806.

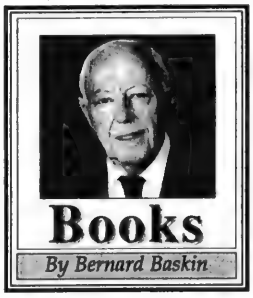
Their pledges of unwavering loyalty to France satisfied the emperor.

Consequently, the Jews were accorded vastly expanded civil rights and the privilege of assimilating into Christian society. In jurisdiction after jurisdiction, they were permitted to own land, join the military, vote and otherwise take part as citizens in the affairs of state.

The first Jewish civil records of births, marriages and deaths date from precisely that era (1808) in many towns in Prussian-Poland, Galicia and Russian-Poland. The notion of social equality was so pervasive that Jewish, Catholic, Evangelical and other records were often transcribed side by side in the same ledgerbooks until about 1825.

For Ashkenazi Jews, this era marked the passage from medievalism to modernity, collectivism to individualism; it also gave rise to the Conservative and Reform movements. Distanced from their own Orthodox traditions, the intellectuals sought to understand Jewish society and preserve its past through scientific studies of folklore, literature, culture, religion – and genealogy.

Those interested in reading more on this complex and fascinating subject are encouraged to consult The Course of Modern Jewish History, Howard M. Sachar's classic history of the Jewish people from the 18th century to the present day.



Swiss banks explored

Hitler's Silent Partners* by Isabel Vincent (Knopf Can, $32.95).
Nazi Gold* by Tom Bower (Harper Collins, $35.50).

By now the grim and terrible story is well-known. During World War II, Swiss banks and the government were not neutral. Unimpeded, German troop trains and military supplies used Swiss rail lines en route to Italy to fight the Allies. Swiss heavy industries manufactured and sold military equipment to the German war machine at a substantial profit. Banks provided the Nazis with needed foreign currency for gold bullion stolen from the central banks of conquered countries, and for bars refined from the gold gathered from the rings and teeth of millions of slaughtered Jews.

Money deposited in Swiss banks by desperate Jews and others, seeking to assure the financial survival of their families, was made unavailable after the war to relatives and heirs through a callous process of vacillation, mendacity and sheer theft. An amount approaching six billion (in current dollars) may have been involved.

Although the Swiss allowed more than 25,000 Jewish refugees into the country during the war, as many as 30,000 more were ruthlessly turned away. The police stamped the passports of Jewish refugees with a large red J. In 1942, a regulation aimed at Jews forbade political asylum to persons who became "refugees only on racial grounds."

Only under intense international pressure, generated at first by the World Jewish Congress, have the Swiss with great reluctance agreed to open their bank records for discovering and rendering proper and long withheld compensation.

The World Jewish Congress invited the assistance of Republican Senator Alfonse D'Amato, a powerful U.S. legislator, who focused the international spotlight on Switzerland by convening a series of senate hearings in Washington. In response, the Swiss government finally acknowledged the moral bankruptcy of its own institutions during the war and proposed a $4.7 billion fund for the victims of the Holocaust and others who suffered human rights abuses.

The fund proposal, subject to the approval of the Swiss electorate, has led to widespread differences of opinion, bitter acrimony and an anti-Semitic outcry.

Hitler's Silent Partners is the first Canadian book on the subject, and the author, a prize-winning journalist with the Globe and Mail, draws on a number of poignant and telling interviews. She dwells especially on the survivors of Abraham Hammersmith, a Viennese textile exporter, whose family is a kind of record in miniature of Jewish suffering and Swiss perfidy. She also includes the disclosure of Stuart Eisenstat — until recently an American undersecretary of state — on Swiss crimes.

The two books under review complement each other. In Nazi Gold, Tom Bower, a well-known British investigator and historian, covers much of the material in the Vincent account, but draws on previously unpublished source material and archives in Paris, London, New York, Washington and Bern.

He concludes that his book is an indictment of a country, "whose citizens, over the past half-century, boasted to their neighbors about their enviable wealth, quite knowingly profiting from blood money."

Both of these books are well-researched, lucid, revealing, and disturbing. The authors insist, with Edgar Bronfman of the World Jewish Congress, that what is involved in the entire Swiss conspiracy is not just a matter of money. The issue is truth. The issue is morality.

It's all in the genes

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we began our look at the information about Jewish genetic disorders on the Internet and at the scientific and religious consequences of genetic testing. Today, more of the vast resources available on the Jewish Highway. Once again, a caution that the Internet should not be considered a substitute for trusted medical or rabbinic advice.

Perhaps the best known genetic disease to affect Jews is Tay-Sachs. The National Tay-Sachs & Allied Diseases Association [http://mcrcr4.med.nyu.edu/~murphp01/taysachs.htm] is working to defeat Tay-Sachs and over 40 other fatal degenerative disorders.

According to the National Foundation for Jewish Genetic Diseases [http://www.stepstn.com/nord/org_sum/118.htm], two other genetic diseases which are more common among Jews are Gaucher disease [http://www.gaucherdisease.org/] and Niemann Pick disease [http://www.nnpdf.org/].

Less well known is a connection between Schizophrenia in the Jewish Community [http://www.med.jhu.edu/schizophrenia/jewish.htm]. The Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine wants to identify the susceptibility to schizophrenia among Ashkenazi Jews and develop new treatment.

I was particularly interested in an article on Montreal's Stanley Diamond, titled Genetic Detective [http://www.jewishaz.com/jewishnews/970207/genetic.html]. Diamond carries a rare form of the thalassemia gene which causes severe anemia. After repeated transfusions, red blood cells die and cause large iron deposits in the liver and other organs [http://www.thalassemia.org/]. An estimated 500 million people around the world carry the genetic trait that leads to the disease including Sephardic Jews whose ancestry is traced to medieval Spain and Portugal. Stanley Diamond is using all means including the Internet to trace his family tree in order to make relatives aware of the rare disease.

In addition to the many Jewish genetic Web sites, there are several e-mail lists you can join to share your own story and advice. The Genetic Disease Mailing List is found at [http://www.gaucherdisease.org/list.htm]; the genetic-disease listserv at [http://sargon.mmu.ac.uk/genetic.htm]; GENDIS-J: the Jewish Genetic Diseases Discussion area [http://tile.net/lists/gendisj.html] and Mordechai Brown operates the genetic-disease list [http://mofet.macam98.ac.il/~dovw/jw/l/sha0285.html]. An archive of older messages can be found at [http://shamash.org/listarchives/genetic-disease/].

Finally, I'd like to conclude a remarkable Jewish genetic story that you may have caught earlier this year that does not include any illness. A team of researchers from Israel, England, Canada and the United States studied both Ashkenazi and Sephardi kohanim (priests who are descendants of Aaron) [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=593] and [http://www.direct.ca/trinity/aaron.html]. They were able to trace Y chromosomes among kohanim that were much different among other "Israelite" Jews. They were dubbed the "priestly genes" passed from father to son for generations.

So at the conclusion of these columns dealing with genetic illness and disease, I'd like to quote the famous priestly blessing found in the Book of Numbers [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/numbers/torah/06230624.htm]:

"May G-d bless you and keep watch over you.

"May G-d make His presence enlighten you and grant you grace.

"May G-d direct His providence toward you and grant you peace".

Mount Sinai Hospital

Bernard I. Ghert

Mount Sinai Hospital is pleased to announce the election of Bernard I. Ghert as Chairman of the Board. Mr. Ghert is a supporter of the Hospital, has been an active member of its Board of Directors for over 23 years, and has served on the Hospital's Executive Committee for 21 years. He held the office of Vice Chairman for the past six years, and served as Treasurer for over five years.

Mr. Ghert is the immediate past Chairman of Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, and was a member of the Campaign Cabinet during the "Friends for Life" campaign. He is a member of the Foundation's Resource Development Council, and an active canvasser for the Cornerstone, Special Gifts and Corporate divisions.

Mr. Ghert is a former President and CEO of Cadillac Fairview Corporation, Director of CT Financial Services, and Director of Wellington Insurance. He is an active member of the Jewish community, and has served in positions such as Co Chairman of the United Jewish Appeal, President of Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, and President and Chairman of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. He currently holds directorship positions in many organizations, including the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Mount Sinai Hospital is an acute care and teaching hospital located in downtown Toronto that provides an array of health care services and specializes in several multidisciplinary areas including perinatology, surgical oncology, musculoskeletal disease, GI disease and molecular and sub-specialty medicine. In 1985, the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute was established which has formed unique and vital linkages between clinicians and basic scientists in the study of a wide range of common diseases as well as molecular biology and cancer, fetal health, epidemiology (the study of the incidence and distribution of disease, their control and prevention) and biostatistics, and clinical investigative studies.

Russian Jews in Toronto

Rekindling the flame

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Approximately 30,000 Russian Jews live in the Greater Toronto Area. In the second of a two-part report, Bill Gladstone looks at that dynamic and growing community. Part 1 was published last week.

TORONTO — Prodded by an international campaign to free Soviet Jews (Let My People Go, the placards demanded), the Kremlin permitted the first "refuseniks" to leave in the early 1970s. The first representatives of this wave reached Toronto about 1973.

This initial influx, which reached its height in 1979, brought about 10,000 to 12,000 ex-Russian Jews here. The gates closed again in 1981 and remained shut until the collapse of the Soviet empire in 1987. Then a second, even larger wave of Jews chose to leave what many feared was becoming an increasingly anti-Semitic society seeking scapegoats for worsening economic conditions.

"We're now 10 years into the renewed migration," says Perry Romberg, director of the Toronto office of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society of Canada (JIAS). "The rescue is not the same as it was in '87 or '88. Back then, no one knew how long the doors would be open. Now we have a regularized movement. It's easy to get out of the former Soviet Union these days and it's harder to get into Canada."

While an estimated 750,000 Russian Jews have gone to Israel, thousands have preferred cities like New York, Los Angeles, Chicago and Toronto – the four top destinations for Russian-Jews in North America. Toronto's vibrant Russian-Jewish community of about 30,000 is concentrated along the north Bathurst Street corridor between Sheppard and Steeles avenues.

Besides offering the newcomers a variety of essential resettlement services, JIAS hosts classes in Jewish learning and parties on Jewish holidays. Part of the organization's mandate, Romberg says, is to attempt to bring the Russians back into the Jewish fold.

"We're dealing with families that have lost contact with Judaism. Perhaps they had some contact with Jewish tradition as practised by their grandparents, but in most cases their parents had already lost the connection. We're trying to find new and creative ways to help them reconnect to their roots," he says.

Igor Korenzvit, president of IKOR Integrated Facilities Inc., came here from Kiev in 1973, was successful in business and now serves on the boards of various local Jewish organizations, including JIAS, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Jewish Vocational Services and UJA Federation.

"Many Russian Jews don't feel Jewish," he acknowledges. "They know they're Jewish because it's written in their passports, but they don't know anything about the religion. In Russia they couldn't practise it because the government wouldn't allow them and they were afraid. Here they don't do it because they've forgotten the traditions."

A high proportion of the newcomers are intelligent, skilled, well-educated and highly cultured, Korenzvit says. But they don't identify as Jews and few send their children to Jewish schools.

"These are people who can inject fresh blood into our institutions. The Canadians don't know what they're missing.

"In Israel, out of five million people, nearly one million are Russians. Look what they did for Israel. The economy is booming and the country is on the way up. The same thing could happen in the Jewish community here if it would absorb the Russians instead of keeping them isolated."

Like many, Korenzvit is impressed that the Jewish Russian Community Centre attracts so many thousands to High Holy Day services each year. He is not alone in asserting that the centre's spiritual leader, Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, knows the community better than anyone. "Rabbi Zaltzman does more singlehandedly than the rest of the Jewish organizations put together," Korenzvit says. "He holds the strings to the whole 30,000, and I bet he knows 10,000 of them by name. He's a very remarkable human being."

Rabbi Zaltzman holds court in a plain, florescent-lit suite of offices that the centre rents in the basement of a strip mall on Bathurst Street. The walls are adorned with photographs and portraits of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who dispatched Rabbi Zaltzman to Toronto in 1981 to rekindle a spiritual flame in the hearts of Toronto's Russian Jews. Other photographs show homegrown politicos, such as Mel Lastman, David Peterson and Bob Rae, hobnobbing with bearded Lubavitchers in black hats.

Evenings are when Rabbi Zaltzman usually makes himself available to the stream of people who come to see him. His appointment book, which a secretary maintains, fills up quickly. The appointments frequently run until 10 p.m. and sometimes past midnight. He confers with each visitor behind a closed door while the outer office fills with callers.

Rabbi Zaltzman is a personable man with dark eyes, a black-gray beard and a lively sense of humor. In Russia, he explains, his family was one of the relatively few who never abandoned the religion. His grandparents practised it underground and in secret when it became a serious crime to do so in public.

He left Moscow in 1971, went to Vienna, then Israel, where he met his wife. Their first child, a daughter, was born in New York.

"Since we came to Canada, my wife and I have made 10 Canadians. We have five girls and six boys. I think 11 is a good beginning, don't you? Some people say we could form our own baseball team.

"I'm a big supporter of Mount Sinai hospital," he adds.

The rabbi has also instigated an impressive institutional growth. The Jewish Russian Community Centre, founded in 1985, holds religious services in its own Rockford Boulevard synagogue and in two remote locations (near Sheppard and Bathurst and in the Promenade Mall). Today it is a non-profit organization with a board of directors, a staff of 35 and a $1.5-million annual budget that comes entirely from private donations.

The centre operates afternoon Hebrew schools in three locations with a present enrolment of 135 children. In September it opened a full-time Hebrew day school, the Or Menachem Academy, beginning at the Grade 1 level. It also runs a government-licensed day care facility and publishes a monthly newspaper, Exodus.

Rabbi Zaltzman officiates at religious services on Rockford and teaches several classes in Jewish subjects in both Russian and English.

"Our mandate is to help Russian Jews get back to their roots, to recover what the former Soviet Union so skillfully took away from them," he says. "We're trying to undo the damage that was done over 70 years. It's a monumental responsibility."

While many religious leaders would regard a congregation of up to 5,000 as a triumph, he prefers to downplay the accomplishment. "It's only 5,000 out of 30,000," he says. "That's the way I look at it."

It's hard work reconciling religious differences.

But after surviving thousands of years, this family can handle it.

Sharing a common heritage, when we meet one another we feel like family. When we are threatened, we rescue one another like family. And when we disagree, we argue like family.

With 13 million Jews in the world, including over 4 million in Israel, there is much diversity among us. So when we talk about "unity," we do not mean uniformity. Our diversity keeps us healthy, vibrant, and responsive. It must be accommodated and respected.

Until recently, the State of Israel was moving towards this accommodation. The Supreme Court ruled that people converted under non-Orthodox auspices in Israel could not be denied registration as Jews. Provisions were being made for non-Orthodox burials. Women and non-Orthodox Jews were granted the right to serve on municipal religious councils. And the government had begun to allocate funds for non-Orthodox seminaries.

What we are seeing now is a backlash by the ultra-Orthodox. Their goal is to turn back the clock on Israel's recent gains for religious pluralism. But we have come too far, and made too much progress, to let this happen.

North American Jews have always stood ready to help Israel meet its greatest needs. Now our support is needed again, to help the nation face its major challenge of today: working with like-minded Israelis to shape a nation that reflects the founders' vision of tolerance, fairness, and the rule of law. The kind of Israel that makes us proud.

That's why the New Israel Fund provides support to dozens of Israeli organizations working for religious freedom, Jewish spiritual renewal, and dialogue among all streams of Judaism. In fact, it was our beneficiaries who won the very victories that the ultra-Orthodox now seek to overturn.

The New Israel Fund is one of the most dynamic partnerships today between Israel and the Diaspora. For further information about our work and a copy of our free brochure, "The Struggle for Pluralism and Religious Freedom in Israel," contact us at the numbers below.

Russian Reform rabbi impressed with Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The high number of college-educated women and men in Toronto's Russian Jewish community impressed and pleased the first Russian-born Reform rabbi in North America.

During his recent visit here, Rabbi Victor Rashkovsky, 57, also said he was surprised at the number of Russian Jews now in Canada who first went to Israel and said they were confused and frustrated by their experiences in Israel.

About 60 people attended the rabbi's weekend lectures at the first Taste of Judaism course given in Russian, sponsored by Kolel, a centre for liberal Jewish learning, at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Though a Reform graduate of the Hebrew Union College, Rabbi Rashkovsky is the leader of a 110-family Conservative congregation in Oak Ridge, Tenn. That atomic energy centre has a total of 7,500 PhDs in a population of 28,000. It includes one Canadian and four Russian Jewish families.

The bill that would legalize only Orthodox conversions in Israel threatens the Jewish status of 200,000 Russian Jews in that country, many of whom are the result of mixed marriages, Rabbi Rashkovsky told The CJN. "It [Israel] is not in a position to reject such a large number of Jews."

These Jews left the former Soviet Union because they suffered discrimination as Jews and they are being treated unjustly, he said.

"The legislation would completely delegitimize the Reform and Conservative rabbis in Israel. They would have no legal status. Its chief result will be the alienation of the North American Jews from Israel."

There is no disagreement on the process of conversion among all of Israel's religious factions, he said, but the problem arises because the government wants a commitment to practise an Orthodox lifestyle. This is opposed by the 200,000 Russian Jews in question "and a majority of Israelis," he said.

The rabbi said some of the professionals attending his course told him there are 30,000 in the Toronto Russian Jewish community. In the United States there are from 300,000 to 500,000 according to different estimates, including 20 percent of the Jewish population in New York City.

While in Toronto, Rabbi Rashkovsky met two of his former classmates at Hebrew Union College, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Kolel director, and Rabbi Edward Goldfarb of Sharei Beth El in Oakville.

Jewish surgeon awaits trial

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Jewish surgeon is awaiting his trial in Minsk, Belarus, Nov. 24, as the result of what the Committee for Soviet Jewry of Beth Tzedec Congregation says is "vile anti-Semitism."

Dr. Albert Lavrenev, 41, an orthopedic surgeon at the Minsk City Clinical Hospital for Emergency Treatment, has been charged in the death of a neighbor, Olga Vasilieva.

Committee chair Genya Intrator, who has talked to Lavrenev and others, told The CJN that the charges are false and arose out of anti-Semitic actions by Nikolai Polaznic, the son of Vasilieva.

Polaznic claims that before his mother died, she told him that Lavrenev was with two men who beat her up. Intrator says that evidence later proved that Vasilieva's injuries were so serious following the attack that she could not have told her son anything.

There is a long history of Polaznic's harrasment of Lavrenev and his physician wife, Irina, who lived in a flat above Vasilieva, Intrator said.

It started after the Lavrenev family (they have a daughter, Victoria) applied to emigrate to the United States in 1995.

The committee has asked Canadian MPs to intercede on behalf of Lavrenev.

By his own yardstick, are his efforts to rekindle a Jewish flame in Russian-Jewish hearts paying off? "The question is one of continuity. What percentage of today's Russian-Jewish community will stay part of the Jewish community 25 years from now? To give an honest answer, the percentage is not high because less than 10 per cent get any Jewish education."

While many Russian newcomers acknowledge that they see themselves as ethnically Russian rather than Jewish, Rabbi Zaltzman and other local communal figures remain intent on bringing them back inside the Jewish fold. They admit it is a difficult task. How successful they will be, only time will tell.

In the meantime, Rabbi Zaltzman finds guidance and inspiration for his open-ended mission in the teachings of Rabbi Schneerson, who sent him here 17 years ago. Every now and again, he says, he writes a report of his activities and sends it to Brooklyn, where it is read at the revered Rebbe's grave.

Decline of Jewish Vilna rued by YIVO librarian

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Vilna, once the Jerusalem of Poland, is now so bereft of Jewish life that 15 elderly Jewish men have to be paid to make up a minyan at the only synagogue in a city that once had 100.

JEWISH BOOK FAIR

"There are about 2,000 Jews in Vilna and they are not involved in religious life. Being Jewish is not part of how they live," Zachary Baker, head librarian, YIVO Institute for Jewish Research, New York, told an audience at the Jewish Book Fair.

The ownership of about 50,000 volumes, two-thirds in Hebrew and one-third in Yiddish, discovered in a former Catholic church in Vilna, is still under question, Baker said.

The Telz Yeshiva in Cleveland, Ohio claims thousands of volumes. YIVO itself and the State Jewish Museum in Vilna are other claimants. The National Library of Lithuania is hoping to retain non-duplicate books about Lithuania, printed in that country.

In the discussion period, a questioner objected to the books staying there but Baker said, "there is some intellectual justification for keeping the books in Lithuania."

YIVO has been given the right to catalogue and reproduce some of the books and other material, but must return them to Lithuania. However, YIVO's own archival material discovered in Vilna after the war has been returned to its owner.

A hush fell on the audience when Baker showed slides of what were once thriving streets of Jewish residents and culture. "It's sad to see the emptiness of the Yiddish streets," said Gerry Kane, former chair, UJA Federation Yiddish committee.

(A report in The New York Jewish Week said nearly 100 Torah scrolls found in an old Catholic church have disappeared, and a coalition of Jewish agencies is trying to find them and sort out ownership claims for the volumes.)

The Vilna material turned over to YIVO for copying includes some important material, but also a lot that is uninteresting, Baker said. Included are some ads for machine-made, cheap matzot.

The YIVO librarian agreed with a questioner who said it is important to classify and microfilm the thousands of Vilna and provincial newspapers still stored in the former church.

The three-member committee, including Baker, found that the largest single number of Hebrew and Yiddish books came from the library of Hevrah Meftse Haskalah, which before World War II was the largest library operating under Jewish community auspices. A second, the Strashun Library, was the largest Hebrew and Yiddish library in Vilna and most of the 15,000 Hebrew and Yiddish books they had which survived, ended up in the former church.

The lecture was jointly sponsored by Friends of Yiddish, the Committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation, the Leybl Basman Fund and the Shlomo Steinhart Memorial Fund.

Kabbalist rabbi to appear

TORONTO — Kabbalist Rabbi Michel Abehsera will be the featured attraction at the Mystic and Music Melave Malka party, to be held Nov. 22 at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre, 7026 Bathurst St. in Thornhill, at 8 p.m.

Rabbi Abehsera is a Sephardi mystic, naturopath and storyteller. He will speak on the inner dimensions of Judaism and the powers of mysticism.

Also on the program will be Ronnie Wiseman, and his five-piece band Kedusha, playing Jewish reggae.

The evening is sponsored by the Jewish Youth Learning Centre, a new non-profit organization for Jewish youth, Moan Noam, and the Tikun Centre for Natural Health.

The cost is $18 ($10 for students), and includes a buffet meal. For more information, call Rabbi Bahar, 416-633-5722.

Ceramic artist Reches dies at 86

TORONTO — Ceramic artist Herman Reches died recently following a bout with cancer. He was 86.

A Polish-born Holocaust survivor who took great pleasure in sharing his love for Jewish history and literature through his work, Reches began to sculpt after retiring to Israel, where he and his wife spent five years. Previously he had been a cake decorator in New York.

Earlier this year, Reches donated three pieces to the Bathurst Jewish Centre, where he was artist in residence at the Koffler School of Visual Art.

He is survived by his wife Malka, daughter Frieda Wishinsky and two grandchildren.

Israeli author, peace activist challenges status quo

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Oslo accords were not based on an illusion, maintains David Grossman.

The 43-year-old Israeli author and peace activist, best known for his controversial 1988 non-fiction book The Yellow Wind, spoke on Imagining Peace at Toronto's 21st annual Jewish Book Fair, held at the Leah Posluns Theatre. Grossman, whose newest book is The ZigZag Kid, was the opening night speaker, at a program sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

JEWISH BOOK FAIR

"Illusion it is to believe that Israel can dictate its interests. Illusion it is to believe Israel will enjoy the unlimited support of the United States for everything it is doing. Illusion it is to believe that we can continue [as we have been] without it affecting our lives," he said, his strong words contrasting with his understated speaking manner.

David Grossman

Oslo was a dream rather than an illusion, Grossman believes. "Many important things start as a dream – Zionism, the State of Israel. We had no illusions [but] we had hope."

"No sane Israeli will say, 'These are my plans for 10 years from now,'" said Grossman. Oslo hinted at the possibility of a different life, he explained.

"What does it mean to live life not affected so heavily by animosity and violence? How can you just live your life without the very concrete fear of death? It's not easy even for me to do it as a mental exercise. I feel I'm not free to venture into such imaginings."

Functioning as an enemy "kills things inside your soul," said Grossman.

He was horrified to hear a young newlywed on Israeli television a couple of years ago say she wanted to have three children, so there would still be two if one got killed in the army. He recalled "that matter-of-fact voice she used, as if we are doomed to kill the Arabs and they are doomed to kill us, and there's no way out."

Grossman lamented the contradiction between "our deep values as Jews and Israelis and what we have to do in everyday life."

He fears that Israel is heading toward despotism. Among the indications he cited is the refusal of the religious parties "to obey the laws and [their effort] to defy democracy."

Despite the problems, he believes that Israel is "the only place we can practise our values and traditions and heritage, and try to see if we can create this miracle [of] a sovereign, normal Israeli state."

Journalists and artists must "do their jobs and show by the diversity of art they create that there is nothing like the status quo."

Grossman said he regrets the dearth of right-wing artists in Israel, as their presence could "enhance so much the debate."

As a writer, he has always felt "claustrophobic" about being confined to the words that others use.

"If you do not describe reality [using] the right names...and try to imagine it with all its harshness, one day you will wake up to a reality that is indescribable."

He warned that, even now, Israel's leadership is unaware of the explosiveness of the Palestinian situation.

"If you declare, as [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu did, that you will not give the Palestinians a state, if you suffocate their very few hopes for a better future, there will be an inevitable explosion, because that's how people act when they're frustrated, when they have no hope.

"Our real and authentic interest is to live a normal life. This is what Israel was created for."

JWV delegation pay homage to fallen comrades

By LOU VANDELMAN
Special to The CJN

On July 6, the Jewish War Veterans of Canada sent a delegation of veterans, their wives and children to Poland, Belarus and Lithuania to pay homage to their fallen comrades and to "pass the torch of remembrance" to their children, the second generation.

After arriving in Krakow, we were hosted at a reception by the ambassador from Canada, Serge April.

The following day, a remembrance ceremony took place in Auschwitz and at Birkenau. This was the first time the Polish government played a part in honoring Jews who fought the Nazis.

The cities, towns and shtetlach we visited included Krakow, Warsaw, Brest, Gluboke, Szarkowzcyzna, Postavy, Miory, Vidze, Braslav, Koziany, Drujsk, Pohost, Minsk, Chatine, Slobodka, Disna, Druya, Jody, Fonary, Vilna, Kaunas and Ostrow Mazowiecka.

The story was always the same. The Jews of the town had been the storekeepers, tailors and seamstresses.

We often asked the local townspeople, "Are you now better off without the Jews?"

One replied: "When the Jews were here, you could go to the store and buy what you needed, even if you did not have any money. Today, if you do not have the money don't bother going to the store. When the Jews were here, neighbors talked to each other and were close. Today, you cannot trust anyone."

We heard very few expressions of sorrow at what happened. "We could not do anything or help in any way," was the standard response.

In Vilna we visited the two ghettos. It was there that the first Jews were sent to Ponary, where 70,000 were shot and buried (many alive).

When they were retreating from Russia, the Nazis did not want the story of Ponary to become public. This would be one of the first mass graves the Russians would find in their drive to Germany, and the Nazis feared reprisals. Using Jewish slave labor, they unearthed and burned the bodies.

We also visited Kaunas, a city in the western part of Lithuania where we stopped at the "wall of death" at which countless victims waited for the inevitable, sometimes minutes, sometimes hours, sometimes days, many holding children in their arms.

Our mission for the trip was to pass the torch of remembrance to the next generation. We hope we did.

Lou VanDelman is the executive director of Jewish War Veterans of Canada.

Sam Pasternack (centre), National Commander of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, salutes before a memorial in Poland. Joining him were (from left), Canadian ambassador Serge April, military attache Col. Al Stryadka and Jewish war veteran Joseph Riwash.

Beit Halochem launches new national office

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The new national office of Beit Halochem, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel (Canada), at Bathurst and Lawrence, was officially opened at a recent cocktail reception for community leaders and supporters.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman affixed the mezuzah and the guest speaker was Col. Ilan Egozi, executive director of Zahal Disabled Veterans Fund in Israel.

Egozi said he speaks for the 47,000 disabled Israeli soldiers (3,000 are female) who are members of Beit Halochem.

Beit Halochem operates four sports, rehabilitation and social centres for Zahal veterans and their families in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem and Naharia. A Zahal War Disabled Park 40 miles south of Tel Aviv has numerous special devices and recreational equipment, including games for the blind.

In an interview with The CJN, Egozi spoke of his long service in the navy and his war injuries.

"Only when I started to come to Beit Halochem did I find out how important it is to disabled soldiers. Very often it becomes their first home. They get motivation, culture, and most important, they can start a new life."

Egozi joined the navy in 1962 and served until 1986 in the Frogman Unit. He was seriously injured by a hand grenade during a commando attack on the PLO headquarters in Tripoli. He lost his right arm and his right eye and sustained injuries to his legs and body, but after being fitted with a prosthetic arm, he returned to his unit.

He was captured in the Six Day War and remained a prisoner of war in Egypt for nine months. In the Yom Kippur War, he was again injured and remained unconscious for a week. On his return to the navy, he taught and participated in operations in Lebanon. In 1981, he took a post at navy headquarters with the rank of colonel.

Egozi says Beit Halochem has embarked on a project to establish a Senior Citizens Centre.

"Some 4,000 disabled veterans of the War of Independence are seniors and we are building a facility in Beit Halochem Tel Aviv for them, with special programs, a social club, a library and meeting rooms."

Iris Britan, executive director of the Canadian organization said that to commemorate Israel's 50th anniversary and Beit Halochem Canada's 20th year of operation, "it is most important to honor the soldiers who fought in 1948 and were injured for the rest of their lives."

National president Ralph Snow chaired the program. Ruthie Kinar, wife of the consul general, brought greetings. A plaque was presented to Berny Weinstein, who brought the first group of disabled soldiers to Toronto for a vacation 20 years ago and became the founding president.

A citation was presented to Toby and Saul Feldberg for their contribution of furnishings for the new offices and "for their ongoing dedication to disabled veterans."

STATE OF ISRAEL BONDS

On ONE DAY in October, The Jewish Community of Toronto pledged $4,275,000 To be Invested in the Success of The State of Israel.

The great success of this year's High Holy Day campaign is, in large measure, due to the commitment and dedication of our many synagogue chairpeople. We publicly thank them for their efforts and take this opportunity to introduce the community to these very special leaders.

TORONTO — Author Ibi Grossman, a Hungarian-born Holocaust survivor, said dredging up the gruesome details of the war years was a painful ordeal, but recording her story on videotape for the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation was something she felt she had to do for her son and grandchildren, and for the members of her family who perished.

Originally from Poland, Helen Icyk said she put off giving her testimony about the war because she dreaded rekindling the misery of those years. But now that her story is on record with the foundation, she said she is pleased there will be a permanent record of her experience for her offspring.

The two women were among the hundreds of survivors who recently attended an Afternoon of Tribute at the Hummingbird Centre, attended by some 1,800 people. It was presented by the Toronto interviewers for the Los Angeles-based Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation.

The 3-year-old foundation, started by film mogul Steven Spielberg, has been videotaping eyewitness accounts of the Holocaust to create a comprehensive multi-media archive of survivor testimonies.

Survivors and their family members, interviewers and videographers attended the special tribute, where they were honored for their contribution by Janet Klein Slavin, Canadian coordinator of the foundation; foundation president Michael Berenbaum; and event co-chairs Myrna Riback and Sheila Frohlich.

Spielberg expressed his gratitude in a videotaped greeting. "You should be proud of what has been accomplished because each one of you has given so much," he said.

"To the extraordinary and dedicated interviewers, videographers, staff and volunteers, I thank you from the bottom of my heart. And to the survivors, you have taught all of us so much about courage and faith. You remind us all what a precious gift this life is."

Berenbaum, who was instrumental in setting up the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C., was the keynote speaker.

"We are most grateful for your trust, your investment in our collective future, your willingness to share, your capacity to probe the darkness, to return to those places and to bequeath your experience," he told the survivors.

According to Berenbaum Holocaust history was repressed for years in North American culture, but with the passage of time, the events of the Holocaust have grown in importance for society.

Now, the Holocaust in North American culture has come to represent "absolute evil," something that was unimaginable 30 to 40 years ago when Holocaust survivors came here as refugees, he noted.

"You were told, 'Keep quiet about the past. Build a future. Get on with your life.' But you have moved from refugee to survivor, to become the bearers of a particular vision."

He praised the survivors for their courage and optimism. "You made the greatest decision. You brought children into this world. It was an incredible expression of the triumph of hope over the reality of experience. To raise them as Jews was a mitzvah."

Berenbaum said the foundation plans to record 50,000 testimonies and is close to achieving its goal with more than 36,000 testimonies from survivors in more than 50 countries already compiled.

Slavin said November marks the third anniversary of the opening of the Canadian office, which to date has recorded some 2,500 testimonies.

Zionism has put power in Jewish hands: rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — One of the most towering achievements of Zionism is that it put power in Jewish hands says Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg, a professor of history at Columbia University.

"No longer do we stand as the poor man at the door asking for favors," he said in his recent talk at the second of four lectures in the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture series at Holy Blossom Temple.

The holiest place in the world, said Rabbi Hertzberg, is not the Kotel, but the customs desk at the Israeli airport.

"I get tearful every time I walk off the plane in Israel and present my passport at the desk. That is the only place in the world where [we can't hear] that there are already enough Jews [as was the case in Canada and the United States]. That desk is Herzl's memorial."

He said, "Herzl knew that we can't leave the lives of Jews in the hands of [non-Jews]. It is at the customs shed that I cry for all the millions of Jews who were not destined to [survive]."

Zionism attempted to put an end "to the otherness of Jews. Herzl had a dream that we would become like everyone else. That was the great dream of Jewish modernity. On the other hand, however, we keep writing of our contribution to western culture. The truth of the matter is that we are not like everyone else. The fact that we have a country makes us political others," he told the capacity crowd.

Jews may not agree on everything, he said, but we are united about defending Israel. "That is one issue that our community and the rest of the world knows about. More importantly, we have decided that we will not disappear. It is the main concern of Jews in the Diaspora. The attempt of Zionism to end the otherness of Jews failed, as it should have."

Early Zionists, said Rabbi Hertzberg, imagined that Israel would become a secular nation.

To be pious or not is our own business, said Rabbi Hertzberg, but "not to be ignorant is all of our business. If we spend 100 years creating Jewish pride, we must spend the next century [concentrating] on Jewish learning and traditions. These things are not modern – they are eternity."

'Yale Four' living off campus as suit continues

By MARA DRESNER
Connecticut Jewish Ledger

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — In many ways, Elisha Hack is a typical Yale University freshman. He rides his bicycle around campus, threading his way through crowded city streets. He talks about the workload in his Level III and Level IV math and science courses and jokes about how great e-mail is as a tool for procrastination. And he's hoping to take fencing lessons in the spring.

But most Yale freshmen don't appear on CNN and ABC World News Tonight. As one of the self-named "Yale Four," Hack's freshman year has been anything but ordinary.

The Yale Four (Hack, freshman Batsheva Greer of New Haven, and sophomores Jeremy Hershman of Cedarhurst, N.Y., and Lisa Friedman of Lawrence, N.Y.) filed suit against the school Oct. 15, alleging that living on campus, as is required by Yale for freshmen and sophomores, violates their freedom to observe the tenets of Orthodox Judaism.

As far as the housing requirement, Hack says he didn't know anything about it. "I can't say I memorized every piece of information [from Yale]. I don't remember seeing anything about it."

When he found out about the housing requirement, Hack and four others (freshman Rachel Wohlgelernter of Los Angeles, one of the original "Yale Five," is now exempt from the housing requirement after she married in a civil ceremony in September) contacted the school to ask for a waiver that would allow each to live off campus and be exempt from paying the housing fees. The four knew each other through Greer's father, Rabbi Daniel Greer of The Gan School (a yeshivah in New Haven).

"We wrote letters and had a lot of meetings," Hack recalls. "The university was not forthcoming. That's when we started going to the media."

The students also went to attorney Nathan Lewin, a Washington, D.C. lawyer known for defending religious rights cases, who also knows Rabbi Greer.

As the Yale Four have gathered momentum with their struggle, the story has been picked up by media outlets throughout North America and Europe, generating a stream of letters and e-mail to the four students. Hack says that most of the feedback has been positive.

While the case continues to draw considerable attention, interest has died down on campus. "As time goes by, people are less willing to talk [about it]," notes Evan Farber, an Orthodox student from New Rochelle, who is co-president of the Young Israel house at Yale.

Hack is concerned that the lawsuit may give the wrong impression.

"There's a general perception that we're trying to avoid living on campus. We would love to live on campus if Yale would make changes," Hack says. The four students have paid room and board fees of $6,850, even though none of them are living on campus. Hack and Greer are living at home in New Haven, while Hershman and Friedman are both living in apartments off campus.

"There's a little piece of reality that's been brushed under the carpet by Yale," says Hack angrily. "My parents pay the $6,850 and as far as Yale's concerned, they're happy. I can flout the regulations. How important could it be if [paying the money] gets you off?" Hack adds that the money was "paid under protest."

To live on campus, the four say they would need to reside in a single-sex suite with an internal bathroom, suites that Hack says exist on campus. In addition, all the students living in the suite would be asked to commit to having no visits from the opposite sex and no sexual activity.

Hack says that students would choose specifically to live in one of the suites. The university is being asked to enforce the policies for such suites, which they have refused to do.

About 60 Orthodox Jewish students attend Yale, including a number who live on campus. Kosher dining is available and the university has made various accommodations for Orthodox students.

"There are a lot of Orthodox students on campus. I have a lot of [Orthodox] friends in the dorms," admits Hack. "People have different comfort levels. For me, this is where I am, this is what I feel."

Farber is concerned that the lawsuit misrepresents Orthodox Jewish life on campus. "If the lawsuit boils down to [the idea] that it's impossible to live on campus and remain Orthodox, I would certainly take issue with it. It's a big misperception.

"Orthodox students on campus should be respected. Orthodox students who don't want to live on campus also should be respected for their beliefs," Farber continues, adding that there's no consensus among Jewish students about the issue.

The lawsuit has had one unexpected benefit. "It makes us more aware of Jewish life on campus and how great it is to be a Jew at Yale," notes Margot Meitner, a sophomore from Great Neck, N.Y.

"I feel like this whole situation makes us realize how strong and vibrant the Jewish community is here," she adds.

Scene in Ottawa

By STEPHEN BINDMAN

Calgary Jew is Manning's new assistant

OTTAWA — Meet Ezra Levant, devout Reform Jew. No, not the kind of Reform as in Orthodox, Conservative and Reform.

Reform as in Preston Manning, Reform as in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, Reform as in home of right-wing ideologies.

In fact, this 25-year-old Jewish boy from Calgary is as close to Manning as just about anyone.

As Manning's special assistant, Levant gets to put words in the mouth of the newly redesigned leader of the Opposition, helping to craft his lines for the daily 45-minute exercise in television theatrics called Question Period.

During the last three weeks of the recent federal election campaign, he was the designated warm-up speaker to whip up the crowds at Reform rallies into a right-wing frenzy before Manning took to the stage.

So what's a nice Jewish boy, who went to Yiddish school as a kid, who taught bar mitzvah lessons for a year, whose brother is studying to be an Orthodox rabbi at Yeshiva University, doing at the heart of a party with a public image like Reform?

"Jews are not monolithic politically. You know the old saying, 'two Jews, three opinions,'" says Levant.

"Jews love to debate, they love to argue, sometimes to be the devil's advocate. What I like about Reform is the fact that it was in so many ways a party for people who love policy. There's the old joke that Tories go to conventions to get drunk, Liberals go to get a date. Well Reformers go to debate policy.

"In so many things Reformers stood up and said, 'Hey the emperor has no clothes.' Being Jewish there's a tradition of going out on the leading edge. Jews are never half way.

"Was it Freud who said being Jewish taught me that even if the whole world tells you you're wrong, you can still be right. That's sometimes what it's like to be a Reformer – you believe in something and even if you are attacked or criticized all around, you still stick with it just because you believe in it."

Levant, who has degrees in business and law and wrote an always-controversial column for the Calgary and Edmonton Suns fighting the evils of political correctness while in law school, doesn't speak as much as he gushes or preaches.

There's an evangelical fervor to every word that comes out of his mouth, as if Reform is a religious ideology – Judaism aside – as much as political philosophy.

A top Reform insider describes him as a "high testosterone guy who doesn't skip many debates."

For his part, Levant sees one of his roles as trying to build a bridge of sorts between Reform and the Jewish community.

At one time, he admits, there weren't a lot of Jewish Reformers like himself.

But he says that's changing – the top two Ontario organizers in the last campaign, for example, were Jews.

"There are more Jews in Reform than you might think. Now there are so many Jews in Reform that when I meet a Jew who's the president of a constituency association or who's on our executive council, it's no longer a surprise. I don't keep track any more because there are too many."

Levant is especially pleased with the warm reaction Reform is getting in Montreal, especially since the near disastrous 1995 sovereignty referendum.

"It's astounding considering how bedrock Trudeau Liberal that used to be.

"Especially since 1995, there's such a feeling of being abandoned by traditional federalists to the separatists that they are thinking, 'My god, who will stand up for us.' Jews who I think have always been Liberal have received Preston with a warmth that I found stunning."

He says some of the incidents of the early days when Reform was just a burgeoning grassroots movement, such as the expulsion of several members with ties to the neo-Nazi Heritage Front, are a thing of the past.

Despite its past and position on the political spectrum, Levant is emphatic that Jews have nothing to fear from Reform.

"Any party in this country, when you buy a membership all you need really is $5 or $10. They don't do a background search. There's 90,000 Reform party members. Every party will have a nut or two.

"Sometimes when Jews say I don't like Reform, I ask have you ever been to a Reform meeting? No. Have you ever read our policy book? No? Have you ever talked to a Reform MP? No. Well how do you know you don't like it then? Oh I've heard things.

"Let's just put the shoe on the other foot. Imagine if someone said I don't like the Jews. Have you ever met a Jew? No. Have you ever read the Jewish Bible? No. Well how do you know? Let us not prejudge."

So what of the future, will Levant continue to be just a Reform backroom boy, writing other people's words?

Don't count on it.

"I love it. I really love it," he gushes.

"Sometimes instead of writing the lines I wish I was delivering them. Maybe I'll take a crack at it [elected office]. Trouble is, coming from Alberta there's only a couple of Liberals left to knock off."

Some people just can't resist a political shot.

Toronto's mayor-elect, Mel Lastman, says thanks

Makes homeless his top priority

Similarly, Lastman blasts the media for misrepresenting his views on the homeless, whom he's made his top priority.

He maintains that his oft-repeated quote, saying there are no homeless in North York, was taken out of context.

"I did not say what they had on TV. I was boxed into a corner. But you don't cry. You don't complain. Because if you do, you've got problems. They all jumped on that. They just kept printing it over and over."

It was the same thing, he notes, with one report saying Lastman favored a 10-year tax freeze. "I said, constantly, a three-year tax freeze. I would like to see it for 10 years."

Lastman says he's made the homeless his number one priority, partly because winter is setting in.

The United Way recently estimated that the number of people using emergency hostels in Metro every night will top 6,600 this winter, a jump of nearly 70 percent over a year ago. Well over half will be families with children.

"That's terrible," says Lastman. "They'll freeze to death if we don't do anything."

As for more charity casinos, on which many Jewish organizations rely for revenue, and which Metro voters rejected, the mayor-elect said they're nothing more than "a money grab" by the province.

"[The province] is using name charities in order to grab money. This is money in the province's pocket, and no one else's. It's a headache for the municipality.

"Not one charity has come to me and said they want charity casinos. Not one. You know why? Because there's nothing much in it for them. The province is grabbing it all. The charities aren't going to make any more money. They're all wise to it."

Besides, adds Lastman, thinking like a big-city mayor already, priorities should be elsewhere. "We need extra policing and traffic controls. I'm trying to get fences mended. I'm trying to get everybody together."

Israel no longer factor in Jews' refugee claims

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) is no longer denying asylum to Jewish refugee claimants solely because they can get automatic citizenship in Israel, according to the IRB's deputy chair.

John Frecker says Jewish asylum-seekers in Canada are not being turned away any more just because, as Jews, they can go to Israel under the Law of Return.

Frecker told The CJN that over the past few months, the IRB's 170 members have arrived at a "consensus" on the thorny issue of Jews claiming refugee status in Canada.

Frecker said IRB panels are not dismissing claims from Jews just because they are eligible for Israel's automatic protection.

He said Jewish asylum-seekers are being judged purely on the merits of their claim.

That may sound like cold comfort, but it's really a breakthrough.

And the IRB's new policy should go a long way toward clearing up the confusion and anger in the Jewish community over the issue.

Over the past 2½ years, the matter of Jews claiming refugee status in Canada has split the IRB because of two contradictory court rulings.

In 1995, the Federal Court of Canada upheld an IRB panel's denial of refugee status to a Jewish woman fleeing anti-Semitism in Azerbaijan. The court agreed with the panel that because the claimant was Jewish, she was eligible for immediate citizenship in Israel under the Law of Return.

The judgment stated that Antonina Grygorian had "ready and automatic right to another country's nationality," and that Canada's protection was "not a quick fix."

The Grygorian decision, as it came to be known, outraged Jewish communal officials, who feared it would lead to a modern-day closed-door Canadian refugee policy aimed specifically at Jews.

Some IRB panels did use the ruling to deny asylum to Jews, who were told, in effect, to go to Israel, whether they wanted to or not.

But last spring, the Federal Court arrived at an opposite view. It found that Jewish refugee claimants cannot be denied asylum in Canada solely because, as Jews, they can go to Israel.

The court said even though the Law of Return gives every Jew the right to Israeli citizenship, with few exceptions, a clearly-expressed desire to settle in the Jewish state is first required.

The landmark ruling overturned a decision by the IRB, which denied refugee status to a Ukrainian Jewish woman, saying she should make a claim in Israel. The Katkova decision, as it is known, clearly stated that IRB panels are not bound by the Grygorian ruling.

And it seems few panels are relying on the first, more troubling ruling.

The Katkova ruling, which carried more weight because the court was asked to settle the question, "is the decision that is now being followed," Frecker stated. "Everybody is accepting it as the preferred decision."

Frecker said he's "unaware" of any panels still relying on the Grygorian ruling.

Following the Katkova ruling last May, the IRB said it would poll its members on developing a policy on Jewish refugee claimants.

Frecker said there was no need for a consultative process. Members simply arrived at a consensus.

"I think this issue is finally behind us," he said.

Ian Fine, an Ottawa immigration lawyer and board member of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), told The CJN he's had "at least" 40 cases involving Jewish claimants, and "not once" has an IRB panel invoked the Grygorian ruling.

JNF honors Ottawa cantor

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — David Aptowitzer, who served as cantor at the Agudath Israel Synagogue for 42 years, was the honoree at this year's Negev Dinner.

Over 300 people attended the tribute evening at the synagogue to support both the Jewish National Fund (JNF) and the cantor, who is known and admired throughout the Ottawa Jewish community.

Rabbi Arnold Fine, a colleague and friend for many years, described Aptowitzer as "a wonderful bridge between people in various congregations. He is the cement that crosses all congregational boundaries."

"Who among us has not been touched by Cantor David Aptowitzer?" asked Barbara Farber, president of the Jewish Community Council/Ottawa Vaad Ha'Ir.

Reflecting on his life, Aptowitzer used the word serendipity. "Who could ever have known," he asked, "that the young man who left Poland so many years ago would one day stand before you as a Negev Dinner honoree?"

The Aptowitzers' children were all present: Penina and Zvi Gross of Ottawa; Manny from Toronto; and Yitzchak and Iris, who came from Israel with five children and Iris' parents for the occasion.

Aptowitzer asked that funds raised be given to a JNF project to be developed in the Jubilee Forest at Yatir.

Dinner co-chairs were Marion Mayman and Rabbi Reuven Bulka, and the campaign chair was Jack Smith.

„ייִדישלאַנד קאַפּע" – אַ היים פֿאַר ייִדישן לעד

פֿון הענינ ריינהאַרץ

מיט אַן ערך צווי יאָר צוריק האָט דער קולטור־קאָמיטעט פֿון אַרבעטער־רינג אַרײַנגענעבן אַ בקשה צום קאָמיטעט פֿאַרן ייִדישן המשך בײ דער פֿעדעראַציע פֿון גרויס־סאָראָנטאָ וועגן אַ סטיפּענדיע פֿאַר אַ פּראָיעקט פֿון צען אוונטן פֿון ייִדישן לעד אין פֿאַרמאָס פֿון אַ קאָפּע — אינסים, בײַ אַ טעפּל קאָוועע (אָון קיכעלעך אויך). מיר האָבן פֿאַרגעלייגט צו רופֿן דעם פּראָיעקט „ייִדישלאַנד קאַפּע". פֿאַר אונדז זײַנען די צילן פֿון „ייִדישלאַנד קאַפּע" געווען קלאָר. מיר האָבן געוואָלט ברענגען פֿאַרן טאָראָנטער ייִדישן עולם פּראָגראַמען פֿון ייִדישע ליטעראַטור און פֿאָלקס־לידער, אויסגעפֿירט פֿון לאָקאַלע ארטיסטן. מיר האָבן אויך געהאַפֿט צוצוציען צו די אוונטן אַ יינגערן עולם. חוץ דעם, האָבן מיר געוואָלט אויסבאַליטערן די קולטור־טעטיקייטן אויף ייִדיש פֿון טאָראָנטער ארבעטער־רינג, כדי דער ארבעטער־רינג זאָל צוריק ווערן אײַנער פֿון די צענ־טערס פֿון ייִדישע קולטור דאָ אין שטאָט. קולטור־טעטיקייטן אויף ייִדיש זײַנען דאָך אַלע מאָל געווען אַ וויכטיקער באַשטאַנדטייל פֿון די טעטי־קייטן פֿון ארבעטער־רינג.

CJC-Q approves move to new Campus building

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The future of Canadian Jewish Congress-national (CJC) in Quebec became the overriding issue after its national officers and the Quebec regional executive conditionally cleared the way recently for CJC-Q to relocate within two years to the planned Jewish Community Campus at FEDERATION CJA.

During a Nov. 2 meeting in Ottawa and despite continued concerns over "process," CJC's national officers voted 15-4 "in principle [in] favor of the move...subject to the satisfactory resolution of the issues of concern to the officers, including, without limitation, budget, the building [Samuel Bronfman House], the archives and the integrity of Congress..."

But the vote did not end the reverberations that continue to resound within CJC.

Three days later, in protest over the "process" – some CJC national figures accused the CJC-Q of entering into talks with federation without consulting them – Renee Switzer of Vancouver resigned as chair of CJC's strategic planning committee. She also tried to resign as chair of CJC's national executive committee, but last week was persuaded to stay on.

Switzer said in a statement that "recent attempts to undermine the work of the [strategic planning] committee, as well as that of the CJC national administration, cast a shadow of non-confidence in the integrity of the CJC strategic planning process and therefore necessitated my resignation."

She told The CJN, she had been subject to "unbelievable pressure" to change her mind about resigning.

That same evening in Montreal, at a session of the CJC executive, faced with a virtual fait accompli in light of the national officers' vote, members voiced their support for the resolution in overwhelming numbers – 38 to 3 with one abstention.

Some members appeared to have an air of reluctance and resignation, particularly CJC stalwarts who have resisted for years what they saw as a continued effort by the federation to "take over" Congress.

Virtually all members, however, seemed ready, at least for the time being, to take FEDERATION CJA at its word that it would guarantee CJC-Q's autonomy, and were encouraged by the news that the region would continue to be fiscally viable.

Discussions involving FEDERATION CJA, CJC-Q, CJC-national and CJF-Canada (its funding body which has supported the CJC-Q relocation), prior to the executive meeting, had put the "process" issue in the background and were cordial in tone, the executive was told. All parties negotiated with sincerity and in good faith.

The executive voiced its "strong preference," that CJC-national stay in Montreal, one of the most important issues left hanging in light of CJC-Q's planned relocation.

The move put into doubt CJC-national's future at Samuel Bronfman House, its downtown Montreal headquarters for the last 30 years and the home of CJC's national archives, whose future location also remains uncertain. CJC-Q has been burdened with an "occupational cost" or "overhead allocation" of $110,000 annually to be in the building, a cost that would have to be picked up by CJC-national if it stayed there.

At the new campus, CJC-Q would pay no rent for the space it occupies. It also has been promised a guaranteed level of "allocated funding," approximately $455,000 per year, the amount currently apportioned to CJC-Q by CJC-national, as long as campaign revenues remain stable.

Ultimately, Bronfman House could be put up for sale, although it is believed that CJC-national would continue to maintain a "presence" with an office elsewhere in Montreal. The CJC archives, according to one idea being put forward, could be consolidated with those at the Jewish Public Library and Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

FEDERATION CJA has invited CJC-national to come to the campus, but it would have to pay rent. However, president Goldie Hershon sees moving the national offices there as unlikely, since Ottawa is increasingly the focal point of CJC's national advocacy agenda. Moving to Ottawa is a more possible prospect.

All the outstanding issues – the status of CJC-national, CJC-Q autonomy, the building, budgeting and archives – will be the subject of detailed discussion in coming weeks involving CJC-national, CJC-Q, FEDERATION CJA and CJF Canada.

Canada, Israel relations 'good,' says ambassador

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Relations between Canada and Israel remain "good, on a sound basis of friendship," despite the recent passport affair, the Israeli ambassador to Canada told a Halifax audience recently.

David Sultan was on a five-day visit to Atlantic Canadian centres, his first official visit to the region since his appointment a year ago. He spent two days in Fredericton and three in Halifax.

He stressed that the volume of trade between Canada and Israel has jumped 45 percent over last year, since the implementation of a free trade agreement between the two countries.

"And Prime Minister [Jean] Chrétien will attend the lighting of the first Chanukah candle at Parliament Hill Dec. 23 to mark the beginning of celebrations of Israel's 50th anniversary. In retrospect, the passport crisis will not harm the good relations between Canada and Israel," he said.

Sultan met university and government officials in Fredericton and addressed a Jewish community audience of nearly 60 people.

In Halifax, the ambassador met government officials, the lieutenant-governor, two university presidents, the editorial board of the Chronicle-Herald and Mail-Star, and addressed members of the Atlantic Canada Jewish Students Federation at a Shabbat dinner.

At a community reception attended by 75 people, Sultan updated the peace process for Haligonians.

"We're not having the hoped-for progress we expected, but difficulties are part of any process. We remain committed. Peace in the long range is the only viable option. It's certainly the biggest challenge."

Sultan, who served as ambassador to Egypt for four years prior to his Canadian assignment, emphasized that Israel has to calculate carefully its every move in the peace process.

"The tendency in the world is to support the Palestinians. They are perceived as the weak side, but this is a misperception. They are part of an overwhelming Arab majority in the region. I'm confident we'll reach an agreement, but only with more ups and downs and additional crises."

On Syrian peace, Sultan said: "[We're] trying to find a formula to resume talks. We'll have peace, but it's a long way off." On the conflict among religious sects in Israel: "To face our challenges, we must unite and combine our efforts. We could all do with a little more tolerance. Religion must not be a dividing factor." And on the botched assassination attempt of the Hamas leader: "The man is not a saint. We're at war with the Hamas and people don't understand that."

In his address to the newspaper editors, he said Israelis can't understand why the process of prosecuting alleged Nazi war criminals takes so long. "Low prosecution is certainly a concern for Israelis. They'd like to see things move more quickly and efficiently."

He stressed the importance of the People to People initiative between Israelis and Palestinians: "We've organized meetings between student groups and teachers' groups, and established small collections of Israeli material in 100 Palestinian libraries and vice versa. It doesn't cost big money. Canada is participating in peace forces and multilateral talks, but we'd like to see more in the People to People program. To a great extent, the peace process depends on it."

Kristallnacht ceremonies held across Canada

Jewish communities from across Canada came together on Nov. 9 to commemorate Kristallnacht, the night of destruction of Jewish synagogues, homes and businesses in Nazi Germany, Nov. 9, 1938. Here are two of many local community accounts.

The evening was dark, damp and foggy, which reflected the mood of more than 100 people crowded near the Halifax cenotaph in Grand Parade Square.

They gathered to commemorate Kristallnacht and to celebrate Dignity Day, designated to encourage humankind to eliminate hatred and respect each other.

Men, women and children carried lit candles a few hundred metres from Province House, the seat of the Nova Scotia government, to the central city square, and then quietly laid their candles at the base of the cenotaph.

"The turnout is very encouraging," said Larry Riteman, chair of the Atlantic Jewish Council education committee, and the son of a Holocaust survivor. "This is our sixth year of Dignity Day and the large numbers indicate people want to learn the best lessons they can from the sorrows, grief and losses of war."

Candles were placed by Nova Scotia's lieutenant-governor James Kinley, provincial labor minister Gerald O'Malley, and Halifax Regional Municipality Mayor Walter Fitzgerald. Among other dignitaries attending were provincial attorney general Alan Mitchell and Halifax councillors Howard Epstein, Bob Harvey, Clint Schofield and Russell Walker.

Holocaust survivors Helena Jockel and Philip Riteman placed candles on behalf of other survivors, while a large group of Halifax-area children represented youth and the hope for the future.

Viva Press, co-president of the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation, a University of King's College journalism student and CJN columnist, spoke of the significance of Kristallnacht.

In Vancouver

A standing room crowd of approximately 750 people crammed into the Beth Israel Synagogue in Vancouver to commemorate Kristallnacht.

Dr. Chris Friedrichs, a professor of History at the University of British Columbia (UBC) and chair of the Kristallnacht committee, began the ceremony with an address in which he noted that Kristallnacht heralded the beginning of the Holocaust and was, in fact, "the beginning of the road to Auschwitz for European Jewry."

After the address, six candles were lit by witnesses, survivors and members of the Vancouver Jewish community, to commemorate the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

The keynote speaker, Dr. Rudolf Vrba, a resident of Vancouver and an emeritus professor at UBC, is a distinguished biochemist and Holocaust Educator, renowned as one of only five Jews ever to have escaped from Auschwitz. He spoke on the issue of Money and the Holocaust and the role of the Holocaust in German Economic and Military Strategy from 1941 to 1945.

In a poignant speech, Vrba, who spent 2½ years in Auschwitz as a slave laborer and who has written about his experiences, questioned the use of the term extermination to describe the fate of the Jews of Europe.

"No one was exterminated in the Holocaust. The victims of the Holocaust were murdered," he claimed.

He also pointed out that robbery, which is rarely discussed in relation to the Holocaust, "was an integral part of the Holocaust." In fact, he said, "the Holocaust was a case of murder in the furtherance of theft."

The Nazis murdered Jews and systemically robbed them, he said.

He also refuted the claim that the regular German army "had clean hands" and that they were unaware of the fate of European Jewry. "The fate of Jews was no secret to the German army," he emphatically stated.

The program was organized by the Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society and the adult education committee of Congregation Beth Israel.

Passport affair will not be repeated, Axworthy told

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM – The much-awaited visit to Israel of Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy took place last week in the wake of the abortive Meshal assassination attempt by the Mossad in Amman almost two months ago.

Statements made by Axworthy and Israeli government ministers, although mostly conciliatory in nature, still do not answer the basic question — are Canadian Israel relations back on track following the misuse of Canadian passports in the Meshal affair?

Prior to Axworthy's arrival, the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv distributed a media announcement in which he described the aims of the visit. "The convention to ban anti-personnel mines, and the direction of the Middle East peace process will be at the top of the agenda during my visit. I will seek the support of countries in the region to join the global coalition on the landmine issue. In the context of the peace process, Canada is in search of a just, comprehensive and lasting peace in the region, which includes the Palestine refugee question."

While in Israel, the media announcement continued, Axworthy will pursue clarification on the steps taken to ensure that Canadian passports will not be misused again. It was this last item that gave the journalists, following Axworthy during his 30 hours in Israel, an obsession to find the truth and to explain unresolved issues.

Following a closed meeting with Israeli foreign minister David Levy, the two men sat down in front of the press to make their statements. "I am very happy to be in Israel on this, my first visit. I found the experience this morning [at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial] very moving. It will live with me for a very long time," said Axworthy. "At the same time we had the opportunity to talk about many bilateral issues. "We want to support increased dialogue between people in this region. I am pleased that Israel will be in attendance at the Ottawa meeting to help the victims of land mines...."

Then came the questions on everybody's lips — the passport affair.

"We received from Minister Levy assurances that directives had been given to all the appropriate authorities and agencies so that it will not happen again," said Axworthy.

In response to the claims expressed by the former Canadian ambassador to Israel, Norman Spector, to the fact that Canadian Embassy staff and security officials were aware that the passports were being used by the Mossad, Axworthy said, "He is wrong, period. As far as the Mossad is concerned, we have a number of arrangements where we share information, and that's it."

Why was the Canadian Ambassador David Berger recalled? Axworthy said,"We just wanted to ensure that there was no Canadian connection and that the passports were not of Canadian making — they were in fact forged."

Foreign Minister Levy justified Israel's policy in fighting terror by sending hit squads after her perceived enemies outside her own borders. "Israel faces a situation that very few countries in the world have to face," he explained. "There are factions that try to kill and injure our innocent civilians. The results are tragic and we face a very heavy toll. We are always turning to friendly governments to help us prevent these tragedies and to stop our enemies from acting against us — but we are not always successful. Sometimes we are forced to take action on our own. In the case of our action in Jordan, this was in no way directed against that country, or Canada. I think that the governments of Jordan, Israel and Canada have acted wisely in order to address the situation. We wish to see this matter behind us.

"Relations between Israel and Canada are based on shared values: two democratic countries, both making a big contribution to fight international terrorism. Unfortunately there are few countries who are prepared to fight international terror, which itself knows no boundaries. We live in an area where there are dangers, not only to Israel, but to other countries in the region. This threatens the stability of the whole area and beyond."

Just before leaving for Jordan, Axworthy met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. It was hoped that there would be a joint press conference to close the passport affair, but Netanyahu refused to meet the group of journalists waiting outside his office, preferring to issue a short statement describing his meeting with Axworthy.

He covered the peace process and the war against terrorism and reiterated the promise made by David Levy regarding the use of Canadian passports.

After the meeting with Netanyahu, Axworthy told The CJN "It wasn't my job to probe significantly what directives were given to security personnel. We received an aide memoire in writing with guarantees and assurances that this will not happen again."

In response to the question of whether he will make the contents of the aide memoire public. "No, we will not."

Following the Axworthy visit there are still many unanswered questions concerning the Meshal affair and the interaction of friendly governments in fighting international terror. It was hoped that the minister's visit might remove any remaining tension marring the usually cordial relations that exist between Israel and Canada, but this was not to be so. A joint appearance before the media of Netanyahu and Axworthy, as well as an unequivocal statement by Axworthy that Canada accepts Israel's apology, could have cleared the air. Neither was forthcoming.

Axworthy also announced last week that Canada will contribute $1 million to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) to rebuild shelters for Palestinian refugees.

The minister made the announcement while in Gaza as part of his Middle East trip.

Time running out for peace process: Albright

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

DOHA, Qatar — Warning that time is running out for the peace process, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright last Sunday called on Israel to implement the interim agreements with the Palestinians.

"Palestinian leaders must intensify cooperation on security issues and speak more consistently the language of peace," Albright told the opening of the Middle East and North Africa economic conference in the Qatari capital.

"Israeli leaders must meet their responsibilities by taking steps to restore Palestinian and Arab confidence in their commitment to implementing Oslo."

The Doha conference, being held under tight security with special U.S. units deployed, is being boycotted by a majority of the 22 members of the Arab League. These nations have accused Israel of refusing to trade land for peace with the Palestinians.

Among those who have boycotted the conference are Saudi Arabia, Egypt and the Palestinian Authority. Israel has sent a lower level delegation than in the past.

In words that seemed directed at Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Albright said that Middle East leaders cannot "sit on the fence and wait for others to take the risks and summon the requisite courage to bring peace about. Partners have obligations – to make their partners stronger, not weaker, to act in the spirit of peace, to take into account the needs and views of others."

In her speech, Albright mentioned the late Egyptian president Anwar al-Sadat, Menachem Begin, Yitzhak Rabin, Yasser Arafat and Jordan's King Hussein as examples of those who have shown courage to make peace.

Albright said the peace process is in danger "not because the people of the region do not desire peace, but because leaders have failed to take the actions required to realize the possibilities of peace."

She urged Israel to agree to measures that would help the Palestinian economy and reduce closures of the territories.

She said Israeli-Palestinian negotiations are based on a four-part agenda of security, further IDF redeployments, a "time-out on settlement activity" and accelerated talks on final-status issues.

She reiterated U.S. support for UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338, "including the principle of land for peace."

Her words reflected what U.S. officials said is Washington's frustration with the stalled peace process.

Arab leaders at the conference accused Israel of threatening war.

Congress presses Russia on Iran missile program

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Congress is stepping up pressure on Russia to stop aiding Iran's ballistic missile program.

In a move aimed at containing Iran's potential to rain terror on Israel and other nations, the House of Representatives has approved a bill that would provide for stronger sanctions against countries, companies or research institutes helping Iran develop ballistic missiles.

Sanctions would include eliminating all U.S. assistance for two years.

President Bill Clinton has threatened to veto the measure. The administration said the bill would interfere with diplomatic efforts to address the problem of Russian companies aiding Iran.

A similar bill pending in the Senate has gained the support of 82 co-sponsors, but will not be taken up until January, after Congress returns from its recess.

Russia has repeatedly denied charges that it is passing missile know-how to Iran.

United States and Israeli intelligence reports indicate that with continued help from Russian firms, Tehran could have the ability to launch ballistic missiles equipped with chemical, biological and other warheads capable of reaching Israel and other states in the region within the next year.

"If the supply of Russian technology is not stopped, then within a year Iran would become self-sufficient and would be able to create those missiles on its own," Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told a recent meeting at Britain's House of Commons last week.

The American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), which undertook an "emergency mobilization" to push the measure through Congress, praised the House's action.

"This is amongst the most timely, vital national security issues calling out for decisive U.S. leadership," said Howard Kohr, executive director of AIPAC, the pro-Israel lobby. "Regretfully, diplomacy alone has failed to stop the flow of missile technology to Iran."

The legislation, known as the Iran Missile Proliferation Sanctions Act, requires the president to report within 30 days if there is "credible information" that a country, company or research institute transferred missile goods or technology to Iran.

The bill allows the president to waive sanctions for reasons of national security.

"It's now time for the Congress to say enough is enough," said Rep. Benjamin Gilman (R-N.Y.). "We need to back up our rhetoric on non-proliferation with meaningful action."

Although the White House opposes the bill, Vice President Al Gore told a delegation from the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations that the House vote would serve as a useful tool in persuading the Russians to curb missile cooperation with Iran.

LONDON – The Iraqi regime plotted last year to assassinate the United Nations' former chief arms inspector, Sweden's Rolf Ekeus, Iraqi opposition sources revealed last weekend. A last-minute warning from their intelligence contacts in Baghdad saved the Swedish diplomat's life.

An informant deep inside Iraq's intelligence establishment notified the Iraqi National Congress (INC), the main opposition group seeking Hussein's overthrow, of the murder plot, the sources said.

They said Ekeus was to have been given a dose of thallium, a lethal substance that has no taste or odor, but which causes rapid physical deterioration and ultimately death.

Upon learning of this, INC president Ahmed Chalabi sent a letter to Ekeus alerting him to the plot and urging him to take precautions. Ekeus was said to have verified the Iraqi scheme through his own contacts and acted accordingly.

Iraq further isolated

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The growing crisis pitting Iraq against the United Nations (UN) has further isolated Saddam Hussein's regime, but triggered a groundswell of Arab opposition to the use of force to solve the problem.

Last week, in response to its refusal to cooperate with UN weapon inspectors and its threat to shoot down U.S. reconnaissance flights verifying Iraq's compliance with UN resolutions, the Security Council passed a resolution tightening sanctions against Iraq. Retaliating, Baghdad expelled American inspectors. The UN then withdrew all its monitors from Iraq, thereby imperilling the weapon inspection system.

The latest instalment in the seemingly perennial confrontation between Iraq and the UN is colored by a sense of deja vu. Since the end of the 1991 Gulf War, Iraq has played a cat-and-mouse game with UN monitors, who are charged with the task of certifying that Iraq destroys its remaining stockpile of chemical, biological and nuclear weapons.

In September, Iraq submitted a "final and complete" report claiming that its biological weapons programs had been terminated. But last month, the UN accused Iraq of withholding data on its non-conventional capabilities, including missiles.

The UN, since Iraq's battlefield defeat in the Gulf War, has maintained a regimen of economic sanctions against Baghdad, barring Iraq from selling all but a fairly insignificant quantity of its oil.

Iraq was promised relief from sanctions if it fulfilled UN requirements designed to reduce its military capacities. Exerting great coercion on Baghdad, UN inspectors partially succeeded in defanging Iraq and cutting it down to size as a regional power. But through a ceaseless campaign of evasion and deception, which began to take shape in the wake of the 1991 war, Iraq managed to renege on its pledge to relinquish all its chemical, biological and nuclear materiels and its weapons of mass destruction.

In the face of its continual violations of UN resolutions, the United States – which has spearheaded the drive to enforce Iraq's compliance – has enlarged the so-called no-fly zones in northern and southern Iraq and bombed Iraqi bases and factories three times since the Gulf War.

Iraq's strategy in dealing with these intrusions of its sovereignty has been to highlight the crippling effects sanctions have had on its long-suffering population and to try to undermine the Western/Arab coalition which drove Iraq out of Kuwait.

Iraq has been somewhat successful in driving a wedge between the United States and several of its allies. France and Russia, seeking lucrative commercial opportunities in Iraq, have advocated an easing of sanctions. Last month, much to the annoyance of the Clinton administration, they joined China, Kenya and Egypt in abstaining on a UN resolution which threatened still more sanctions unless Iraq improved the level of its cooperation with UN weapon inspection monitors. This resolution emboldened Iraq to bar Americans from the monitoring teams, which in turn prompted the Security Council, at the behest of the U.S. and Britain, to bolster sanctions.

The imposition of fresh sanctions is not only a serious blow to Iraqi diplomacy, but also a reminder that Saddam Hussein is a reckless gambler with a bent for miscalculation. Throughout the 1990 crisis, which climaxed with the Gulf War, he committed repeated blunders. And now he has made yet another one.

He can, however, draw solace from from the fact that Arab states firmly oppose a military solution, and support his position that a timetable should be established for an end to sanctions.

There is resentment in the Arab world that Washington, while pressuring Iraq, has been reluctant to lean on Israel to soften its policy toward the Palestinians in the Oslo peace process. Iraq, in a reprise of its tactics in 1990, is obviously trying to exploit this grievance.

PM's message of hope

Netanyahu touched on a number of other subjects in his 30-minute address.

Echoing the theme of one of the key resolutions passed at the GA, he stated: "We must support Jewish education in the Diaspora and bring Jewish youth to Israel to experience our nation in its homeland.

Earlier in the day, a resolution had been submitted to the assembly that reaffirmed "our commitment that the survival of the Jewish people obliges all federations to work diligently to make quality Jewish day school education available to all Jewish children whose families desire it including those whose families do not have the necessary financial resources."

Netanyahu also spoke about the peace process and Jerusalem. He urged Palestinians not to miss the opportunity for achieving peace.

"The right thing to do is go on a fast track. Our hand is extended in peace."

On Jerusalem he repeated that it will stay undivided forever.

Ted Zacks, president of CJF Canada, called the GA a "terrific opportunity for the leadership of North American Jewish communities to learn from each other, to communicate with each other and to find solutions to the issues with which we are dealing."

The Week in Israel

Nov. 10

• Former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger said in Tel Aviv that Israel must accept that a Palestinian state is "inevitable," and urged the Palestinian Authority (PA) and Israel to move quickly to negotiate a final peace deal.

Nov. 11

• Political leaders called for a national reconciliation as memorial ceremonies on the second anniversary of the murder of Yitzhak Rabin were held around the country.

• The joint Israeli-Jordanian airport in Aqaba began operations for a four-month trial period.

Nov. 12

• The Likud party abolished the primaries that determine the party's list of candidates for Knesset elections. This restores the power of the party's central committee to draw up the list. Leading Likud ministers called the move undemocratic.

• Two Palestinian land dealers arrested on suspicion of selling land to Jews died in Palestinian jails over the weekend. PA police reported the cause of death as illness.

• Yuval Rabin, the son of Yitzhak Rabin, received a threat to his life on his way to memorial services for his father.

Nov. 13

• Knesset members called for the Shin Bet handlers of Avishai Raviv, the acquaintance of Yigal Amir, to be put on trial following the release of parts of the classified section of the report on Yitzhak Rabin's assassination. A section of the Shamgar report disclosed that while Raviv frequently instigated political violence, his handlers believed that the information he provided outweighed the damage he inflicted.

• Israel agreed to begin making payments to Australian athletes injured in the bridge collapse at the opening ceremonies of the Maccabiah Games in July.

Nov.14

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met separately in London with British Prime Minister Tony Blair and U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

Genetic markers a focus of breast cancer research

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Advances in breast cancer treatment will come in a series of small steps, rather than one dramatic advance, according to a panel at the recent Dialogue on Breast Cancer II.

The focus of current research, panel members agreed, is mainly on genetic markers for the disease, new imaging techniques and new drugs.

The program was held at Mount Sinai Hospital's Ben Sadowski Auditorium and was a joint venture between the hospital and Scotiabank.

Statistics on breast cancer are chilling, noted moderator Linda Boyle, health reporter for Global Television. "One in nine women will get it and it claims a life every 12 seconds. Everyone knows someone – it robs families of mothers, sisters and wives."

Pamela Goodwin, director of the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, stressed that mortality from breast cancer has remained stable in recent years; in fact, she said, the numbers have even fallen.

This is due to better screening, she said, since earlier detection leads to more cures and to the availability of better treatment programs.

While age appears to be the only sure risk factor for contracting breast cancer, Goodwin said, other factors appear to include living in a western society (although no one seems sure just why that is); reproductive history, such as age at the onset of menses, menopause and the birth of the first child; lifestyle, including diet and exercise; and family history.

Hormone replacement therapy, currently widely used to overcome the effects of menopause, "seems to have a small, very small, influence, but not until after it has been used for 10 years."

Nevertheless, she emphasized, "70 percent of women who suffer from breast cancer have no risk factors other than age."

Irene Andrulis, a scientist at the Lunenfeld Research Institute and director of the Ontario Cancer Genetics Network, said that while only five to 10 percent of breast cancer cases appear to be hereditary, it is important to at least identify those at risk, so that they can be closely monitored and can get the most appropriate treatment.

Family history in itself is not necessarily significant, she said, since there is no way of knowing if the incidence is indeed hereditary or just a "cluster" of cases.

Research is being carried out among those Ashkenazi Jews who carry a gene mutation called BRCA1, which appears to increase the risk of breast and ovarian cancer.

Even so, she said, only one percent of the Ashkenazi population carries that gene. Research hopes to determine what other factors influence carriers to get the disease.

Roberta Jong, a radiologist at the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre and director of breast imaging there, said that mammography, magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) and ultrasound are used to diagnose breast cancer.

Routine mammography is a very useful tool, Jong said, since it can detect cancers early, before they can be felt by the woman herself or by a health professional.

"If tumors are caught early, 93 percent of patients are still alive 20 years later," she noted.

There is some controversy over when routine mammography should begin. The Canadian Association of Radiologists believes it should start at age 40, with follow-ups every one to two years. The Canadian and U.S. governments support beginning at age 50, and that is what is usually done.

Conservative surgery, radiation often effective

Saul Sidlovsky, a surgeon at the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, and head of Mount Sinai's breast disease department, had three pithy pieces of advice for people who discover a lump in their breast: Don't ignore it or deny it; don't assume a worst case scenario; and go and see your doctor at once.

While for many years the surgical treatment of choice was a radical mastectomy, in which the whole breast and the pectoral and axillary muscles were removed, or a modified radical mastectomy, in which the muscles were by and large left in place, now, Sidlovsky said, conservative surgery (removing just the lump and a surrounding margin of tissue free of tumor, to be sure the whole cancer area is gone) together with radiation treatment has been found to be effective in 70 to 75 per cent of patients.

Goodwin warned against blind use of alternative therapies, urging people to make sure the ingredients are listed on the package and are standardized from package to package; to consult a physician about side effects and possible interactions with other drugs; and to be careful about spending large amounts of money or discontinuing standard medical treatment.

In reply to a question from the audience, Goodwin noted that women who took the birth control pill in the early 1960s are just reaching the age at which breast cancer develops and there is concern in the medical community over the effect the oral contraceptives will have on their susceptibility to the disease.

In response to another question, Andrulis said research is also being done on the effect of environmental factors such as food additives and air pollution.

ABOUT NUTRITION

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My children like to eat melon. Which is the most nutritious?

A. Many melons are very nutritious, but cantaloupe wins first place. One cup contains over 70 times as much vitamin A as honeydew, a healthful dose of beta carotene and almost as much Vitamin C as an orange, plus a significant dose of fibre.

Q. I have been thinking about trying tofu, but I wasn't sure if it has to be cooked or what kind to buy?

A. Tofu does not have to be cooked. It is ready for eating right out of its package. Tofu comes in several varieties: soft/silken, which has a custard-like texture for dips, sauces or fruit smoothies; firm, medium density, which holds its shape for salads, barbecuing, casseroles and soup; extra firm, the best choice for stir frying, crumbling or slicing in a sandwich.

Q. My family loves mashed potatoes, but I find they require so much butter to make them creamy that in the end they are very high in fat and calories. Do you have any suggestions for lightening these up?

A. Mashed potatoes can be creamy and delicious without all the extra fat and calories. I use buttermilk in mine along with roasted garlic to give a very creamy texture without all the fat. Buttermilk is a fabulous low fat substitute to fat in many recipes and has a rich, thick texture of its own.

Chanukah Continuity Campaign

As our way of helping to ensure the irreversibility of Jewish continuity, The CJN is launching a special continuity subscription campaign in time for Chanukah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $14.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Over the past few years, The CJN has grown and evolved into an award-winning national community newspaper widely read both here in Canada and abroad. We are extremely proud of this publication. Could there be a better gift at Chanukah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Sincerely,

mordechai Ben-Dat

The editor.

Hollywoodism:

Simcha Jacobovici's newest film looks at role of Jews in Hollywood

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For better or worse, popular culture in the United States is largely defined and driven by Hollywood films, and has been for at least the past 70 years.

Strange as it may seem, this culture, this vision of American society, was mainly concocted by a circle of Jews who were either immigrants or the children of immigrants.

They were the legendary movie moguls, the hardbitten, yet sentimental showmen whose studios nurtured the archetypical middle-class values and images which so often seem to characterize the essence of America.

Simcha Jacobovici's latest documentary, Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies, and the American Dream, examines this fascinating topic at length.

His film, based on Neal Gabler's book, An Empire of Their Own: How the Jews Invented Hollywood, will be premiered at the Princess of Wales Theatre on Nov. 24 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $36, and can be bought at the box office or by phoning 872-1212.

The event, to be followed by a reception at the Holiday Inn on King Street, is sponsored by the Bloor Jewish Community Centre and the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre.

Written and directed by Jacobovici, Hollywoodism turns on the founders of the major studios – Adolph Zukor of Paramount, Carl Laemmle of Universal, Louis B. Mayer of MGM, William Fox of 20th Century, Harry Cohn of Columbia and, of course, the Warner brothers.

Hailing from Poland, Russia, Hungary and Germany, these quintessential outsiders brought to the fledgling industry a vision of America which, at first, did not correspond to reality. But as they tightened their grip on Hollywood, their fantasy of America, Hollywoodism, prevailed.

The films they churned out during their heyday, the 1930s and 1940s, were stamped with a common touch. They glorified the brave little guy fighting against tremendous odds, extolled egalitarianism and virtuousness, championed the family and promoted a mythical America of boundless optimism, gleaming streets and white picket fences.

The moguls, who essentially supplanted a bigoted Protestant elite that had laid the foundations of the industry, moved it from New York to California and then proceeded to transform it into the most influential art form of this century.

Jacobovici, an award-winning documentarian, tells their story through archival footage, scenes from their films, interviews with their children and grandchildren, and observations by movie historians, critics, actors and producers.

As social history, Hollywoodism is never less than interesting, invariably enlightening and occasionally even riveting.

We learn that two of the most enduring elements of the typical cowboy film, rampaging mobs and burning homes, were derived from pogromist imagery, which had been deeply etched into the minds and hearts of the moguls.

We also learn that the subliminal theme of the lavish Hollywood musical, which they pioneered, was "fitting in." This was hardly coincidental, since the moguls, who went from "Poland to polo" in one generation, craved acceptance from gentiles, tried to blur the lines between Jews and Christians and hewed to an assimilationist agenda.

To some degree, they attained their objective, but at the price of downplaying their Jewishness, all but ignoring Jewish movie themes and insisting that Jewish actors anglicize their surnames.

In their zeal to be upstanding and patriotic Americans, the moguls showed little backbone in times of crisis. Amid the hysteria fanned by the Cold War, they exhibited spinelessness and disloyalty to their employees when a witch-hunting Congress scoured the industry for signs of Communist infiltration.

The moguls buckled under the weight of the investigation because, in the final analysis, they felt basically insecure about their place in America. So much for the notion of upward mobility.

You may mail or deliver your poems to:
CJN Chanukah Poetry Contest, The Canadian Jewish News,
1500 Don Mills Road., Suite 205, North York, Ontario, M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Dec. 8, 1997.

Prizes: The judges will choose six poems to be published, two from each of the three categories, which in their opinion, most poetically and evocatively convey an aspect of the meaning of Chanukah. Each of the "winners" will also receive a cheque for $50.

Only six poems will be selected as "winners". Space permitting, we may publish other poems as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of "winning" depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: "Winning" entrants will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, Dec. 12, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning poems will be published in The CJN of Dec. 25, 1997. We look forward to receiving your poems. May the miracle of Chanukah and the magic of its light be reflected in your poems.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

Charities will win big under gambling proposals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

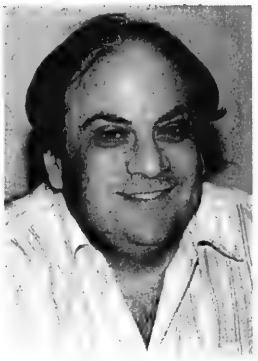
TORONTO — Residents of Ontario seem to have a split personality when it comes to gambling. Tens of thousands enjoy games ranging from Bingo to blackjack, yet voters in last week's municipal elections voted two to one against a proposal to make charitable gaming houses a permanent fixture of the urban landscape.

Under current law, the Ontario government will no longer approve licensing "three-day events" as of March 31, 1998, but will permit the "roving" gaming houses to find permanent homes. While the province has given the green light to the change, municipal governments have yet to provide the zoning and other approvals that casino operators need to begin renovating or constructing facilities, said Gary Gladstone, vice-chair of Charities First Ontario.

Faced with the Nov. 10 vote, which is non-binding, municipal government must now weigh the potential political costs of approving gaming houses versus the economic benefits that gambling venues generate. Estimates advanced by Gladstone suggest that gaming house operators would invest from $4 to $7 million per site and create 400 jobs per venue.

Ontario charities would also be big winners under the new proposals, netting as much as $170 to $180 million per year. Charities First Ontario, which includes organizations like the March of Dimes, Easter Seals, sports clubs, churches, synagogues and BBYO, believes the proposed new regime would be an important component in the fundraising activities of member groups, Gladstone said.

Under the current system, charities are entitled to operate for three consecutive days in any one location before moving on. Close to 1,000 charities ran three-day events in 1996 but their take was substantially reduced by the costs associated with temporary locations. Banquet halls charged "exorbitant rents," security was lax, moving was expensive and advertising costs (to inform gamers of new locations) were high. In addition, charities were faced with the uncertainty of not knowing whether another group planned to move in next door to their new location, Gladstone said.



Gary Gladstone

Under the provisions that take effect on April 1, 36 full-time charity gaming clubs and eight seasonal venues will be situated in industrial and commercial areas. They would operate in facilities about half the size of hockey rinks and approved charities would sponsor gaming in those sites on a rotating basis. Blackjack and poker tables along with video lottery terminals (VLTs) would be featured, Gladstone said.

Ontario charities stand to see a huge jump in revenues under the new regime. Currently, costs eat into revenues so much that charities net about 10 percent of the gross take, or about $10 million per year. Under the new system, they would still receive 50 percent of table revenues, but also get 10 percent of VLT sums. Charities stand to gain as much as $80 million from table revenues and $100 million from VLTs.

Those are huge sums to charities that have found it difficult to raise funds in recent years. "Charities see their funding base eroding from government and donors, [and competition] from other forms of gaming, while their expenses are going up," Gladstone said.

He acknowledged that for many people, gaming has negative connotations. "A lot of municipalities think they're the death of you and that VLTs are the crack cocaine of gaming," he said.

But Gladstone, who also serves as chief fundraiser for BBYO, said, "We look at it as good entertainment and as a way to raise money for charities. Just because some people are alcoholic doesn't mean you get prohibition."

Despite last week's vote, he's "cautiously optimistic" that municipalities will approve the facilities, though none have yet been constructed. Charities First will lobby hard for the changes and try to clear up public misconceptions that colored the municipal vote, he added.

Megamayor-elect Mel Lastman called proposed changes to charity gaming a money grab by the provincial government and he expressed surprise that no charities had approached him to discuss the issue.

"Not one charity has come to me and said they want charity casinos. Not one," he told The CJN's Ron Csillag.

"You know why? Because there's nothing much in it for them. The province is grabbing it all. This is money in the province's pocket and no one else's. It's a headache for us. It's a headache for the municipality and the charities aren't going to make any more money."

Fully versed today in the world of gaming, Gladstone started as the rawest of rookies. Back in the mid-1980s, while serving as the president of the newly founded Maven lodge of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), he and two friends, Carey Miller and Elliott Snitman, ran Bingo games to raise money for the lodge and B'nai Brith.

Gladstone was on the BBYO board when BBC announced it would no longer fund the youth group. BBYO looked to gaming to help fund its activities.

Many other Jewish charitable organizations rely on gaming for funds, including various synagogues, community centres and sports organizations, he added.

"By no means did we sit weeping on the banks of the waters of Babylon... our endeavour with respect to art was commensurate with our will to live."
Viktor Ullmann

An allegory on the nature of fascism and the low value it places on human life, Ullmann's chamber opera The Emperor of Atlantis was in its final days of rehearsal at the concentration camp of Terezin when an SS delegation found the satire in the piece too close for comfort—it was never performed. Shortly afterwards the "model ghetto" was deemed to have outlived its usefulness and nearly all the composers and artists in the camp were sent to their deaths.

Ben Wicks sheds light on Israel's founding generation

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Bloomsbury Publishing of London asked Ben Wicks to write about the birth of modern day Israel, they thought he would produce a historical account and inject his own brand of wit.

But with Dawn of the Promised Land: The Creation of Israel, Wicks found the undertaking was not just a matter of breathing new life into events, but of drawing out the life-blood flowing through those events.

"I undertook the book from a journalistic perspective and I was absolutely astonished at the history and events surrounding Israel's beginnings," said the Canadian author and cartoonist. "I found myself not only telling the tale for one audience, but for two.

"For the Jewish people, I thought it was important to bring to light the real-life details of how these individuals from different backgrounds worked together to turn a malaria-ridden swamp land into a land of their own," he said. "I think these stories offer a sense of pride and heritage to be passed along to their children and grandchildren.

"At the same time, I felt the book speaks to the gentile community, in that it may better understand why the Israeli Jew was so adamant about hanging on to this land, and what personal costs had to be paid."

Printed in Canada by Stoddart Publishers of Toronto, Dawn of the Promised Land is being released this month to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel.

Beginning work on the book in the fall of last year, Wicks drew on interviews with members of Israel's founding generation in Israel, Canada and the United States.

Describing in detail how Jews from many walks of life migrated to the former Palestine, the book examines how individual sacrifices were made based on split second decisions and the unwavering belief in Israel as a greater goal.

"These people were anxious to die for this country because they believed whatever they had to endure to get there was worth it if it meant a better life for their children," said Wicks at the book's recent launch at the Leah Posluns Theatre during the Jewish Book Fair.

"They made wealth and class secondary; doctors and scientists worked shoulder-to-shoulder with people who could not even read because they knew the work had to be done. So division by status disappeared.

"From the VIP to the UIP [unimportant person], you learn about the people who struggled through the exodus, crossing deserts and coming out of every part of Europe. It is through their voices you get to understand the people themselves, and the breed of person that lived there day to day."

Telling the story in multiple voices, Wicks creates a chronology of events starting at the close of World War I and ending with Israel's independence.

"No other country in the world has had such an independence day as Israel," Wicks said. "Being in a position where neighboring countries are ready to pull the trigger as soon as a pen stroke touches the paper, every minute of those 24-hour periods is a story worthy of capturing, in both its tension and its humor."

Wicks also offers cultural and cross-cultural analysis. Comparing Israel at the time of independence to the Tower of Babel, with people speaking 60 different languages, Wicks highlights cultural differences between Jews, especially in kibbutz life, and the willing acceptance of a common culture and language in Hebrew.

And while Wicks eagerly speaks of the character of Israeli pioneers, he said the books tells something more about the human spirit.

"Writing the book gave me an insight into the potential human beings have to do good," he said. "When people can care for each other or work towards common goals, it can knock down any wall that stands in their way."

Just prior to the launch of Dawn of the Promised Land, Wicks collaborated with the Canadian Cancer Society to produce a 96-page booklet So You've Got Cancer. The tongue-in-cheek publication dealing with the emotional impact of cancer on individuals and their families is free. Call 1-888-939-3333.

Play on Orthodox/secular interaction

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Twist of Faith, an engaging play about the interaction between an Orthodox and secular Jew, comes to the Toronto area for one performance this week as a fundraiser for congregation Kehillat Shaarei Torah of Toronto.

Sam, a pony-tailed secular Jew who makes piles of money as a commodities broker, is eager for a hot date with his non-Jewish girlfriend, Lola. But his plans come to a halt when his Porsche gets stuck in the heart of the Orthodox community in Boro Park, N.Y,. during a blizzard.

He is rescued by Baruch, a black-hatted yeshivah student, only five minutes before the onset of Shabbat.

Trapped within the Orthodox world for Sabbath, Sam endures an agonizingly peaceful day without hot water, phones, television or other modern conveniences and distractions. Despite himself, he becomes entranced by the niggunim, the sweet wordless songs of the rebbe.

Baruch, ironically, is intrigued by Sam's fast-paced life and his facility with investing money. Both have strong memories of their encounter, and their lives change because of it.

Playwrights Matt Okin and Michael Gurin make sure there are many twists of fate as well as faith in this work, which received good notices in the New York area, Washington, D.C., and elsewhere.

The Washington Jewish Week called it "a witty, accessible meeting between two distant streams of Judaism" and the Long Island Jewish World said it was "highly entertaining and spiritually uplifting."

Rabbi Anchelle Perl of the Long Island Chabad called Twist of Faith "an evening of meaningful drama, comedy, depth and Torah insight."

Twist of Faith is being performed at the Markham Theatre, 171 Town Centre Blvd., on Nov. 24 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $100 for sponsors, which includes a post-performance reception. Sponsors are entitled to a tax receipt. Tickets costing $36 and $25 (plus a $2.14 booking fee) are also available. For reservations, call 416-229-2600.

Kehillat Shaarei Torah is located at 2640 Bayview Ave. in Toronto.

Jason Alexander reproduces urban art and city scenes

MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jason Alexander's representational paintings pulse with energy and color.

Modern urban canvases — darting taxicabs symbolizing commerce amid a cityscape of streets and buildings — also embody rural vistas which are a foil for the motion.

This juxtaposition of opposite intensified by adroit perspective, involves the viewer in a vibrant experience. There is life to be savored in the hum of Alexander's downtown.

Sometimes there is poignancy. A significant billboard (acrylic on outdoor vinyl), The City Is No Place For Children To Live, commissioned for Covenant House and sponsored by Nike of Canada and Mediacom, focuses on three homeless youths sitting on the curb as the traffic rolls by. To get the "feel"for this, Alexander spent some time undercover among the kids at Covenant House.

The artist outside his Queen Street studio.

The Street* by Jason Alexander. Commissioned for Covenant House.

The 33-year-old Torontonian, a graduate of the Ontario College of Art and Design, has risen in just a few years from struggling artist to a painter of international status. A workaholic, his originals and signature prints are in demand across North America and in Europe. There is also a growing market in Japan.

His city scenes reflect the mood outside his Queen St. West storefront studio but he is relocating to the Collingwood area where he will exchange urban for rural, indoors for outdoors, acrylics for oils. And, the workaholic will also add snowboarding to his lifestyle.

It will be interesting to see the next collection!

To view Jason's art work online refer to Web site: [www.galleryonthe web. com]

His serigraphs are available from the Liss Gallery, 978 Eglinton Ave. West.

CHAT alumni raise funds for tournament

A living tribute to Israel Becker

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Stage 1 is complete, stage 2 gets under way in early December.

About two weeks ago, 160 of the tallest grads produced by the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) gathered for a fundraising basketball tournament. The hoopsters, divided among 13 teams and including the current edition of the CHAT Tigers as well as a teachers team, raised around $2,000 towards the CHAT Israel Becker Invitational Basketball Tournament. End phase 1.

Phase 2 tips off on Dec. 3 and runs until Dec. 7 as 10 men's teams and from four to six women's teams participate in the invitational tournament, which is fast becoming an annual event. The tournament, which will be held at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, is named in honor of Israel Becker, a CHAT alumni who was killed in a car accident three years ago. Becker was known for his devotion to the Jewish community and his passion for sports, particularly basketball, said Josh Sugar, a CHAT grad who coordinated the alumni tournament along with Eitan Mammon.

The tournament is conceived as a "living tribute to Israel and his zest for life," Sugar stated.

Members of the 1988-89 CHAT alumni team are all smiles after finishing first in the invitational tournament for the second year in a row. Seen here (from left): Howard Buckstein, Elliot Birnboim, Joseph Garten, Richard Kaminker, Mike Tylman, Jeff Raphael, Rob Eklove. Bottom: Mike Citron.

Confirmed participants in the men's invitational tourney include: Columbus Torah Academy (Ohio), Bialik High School (Montreal), Or Chaim (Toronto), Akiva Hebrew Day School (Detroit), Hebrew Academy (Montreal), Yeshiva Beit Yitzchak (Hamilton), Ramaz (New York) and CHAT.

In addition to the on-court action, players will participate in a Shabbaton program, a tour of Toronto, an award ceremony and a banquet.

"This tournament will not only be a chance for young boys and girls to have a great time and showcase their talents, it has proven to be an opportunity to promote Jewish identity through athletic, religious, cultural, Zionist and social activities. This tournament can continue to go a long way towards fostering new links and new friendships among our respective communities," Sugar said.

Hosting an event on the scale envisioned is an expensive proposition. That's where the alumni fundraising tournament comes in, said Sugar, a member of the 1990 Tigers team. Each team anted-up $300 towards costs of the invitational, he added.

Members of the women's winning team included: Michelle Bendayan, Jacklyn Wolfman, Amanda Suchter, Ruth Cadesky, Lara Rosenberg, Shayna Greenwald, Liane Porepa, Talia Phillips (captain). Adena Scheer, Lorrie Plonka, Gillian Spergel and Lauren Rotenberg. The team was coached by Aubrey Zimmerman.

For the second year in a row, the '90 men's squad lost the championship game to the1988-89 team, which included: Howard Buckstein, Elliot Birnboim, Joseph Garten, Richard Kaminker, Mike Tylman, Jeff Raphael, Rob Eklove and Mike Citron.

Series included Sukkah

By FAYGIE LEVY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — There was something new to go along with the traditional peanuts and Cracker Jacks at this year's World Series – a sukkah.

The sukkah mobile, a portable sukkah perched atop a U-Haul truck, greeted baseball fans as they arrived at Pro Player Stadium in Miami, home to the Florida Marlins, before game 2 of the Series.

The sukkah, with Jewish music playing from loudspeakers and signs welcoming fans to the "official sukkah" of the World Series, was sponsored by Chabad of South Broward, Fla.

This was the first time a sukkah mobile, which Lubavitch started in the 1970s to allow people to observe the mitzvot of Sukkot, was at a World Series.

Rabbi Raphael Tennenhaus, executive vice-president of Chabad in South Broward, said he picked the World Series as a a place to park the sukkah mobile because the jovial mood of the crowds matched the spirit of the Sukkot holiday, which is also called the time of happiness.

He also compared the unity of fans rooting for the Marlins to the unity of Jews when they gather in a sukkah.

Ten yeshivah students served as hosts. They showed people how to use a lulav and etrog that are shaken together after reciting the blessing.

More than 500 baseball fans took advantage of the sukkah, Rabbi Tennenhaus said.

For some, it was the first time they had held a lulav and etrog. These people had "to go to the World Series to fulfil the mitzvah of lulav and etrog," Tennenhaus said.

About families

Dear Susan,

My parents are newly separated. Despite this (or perhaps because of this) they have indicated that they wish to have our two youngsters spend time with them during winter break. How should we go about negotiating this process?

Dear Reader,

Thank you for sharing your dilemma about the holidays.

You need to determine what is in the best interests of your children, based on an assessment of their fundamental physical and emotional needs. How capable is each grandparent, either individually or together, of meeting these needs? As their parents, your are ultimately responsible for ensuring that your children's best interests are addressed. The decision is particularly important if you have young children who require constant attention.

The first issue that must be addressed is the basic "configuration" of the visit. Will your children be with each grandparent separately, or are they prepared (and are they able) to put aside their differences and accept joint responsibility for the care of your children? Also, should your children embark on the visit together, or separately. (i.e., one with each grandparent).

The decision must be made after thorough discussion with your parents, your spouse and your children. Carefully assess your parents' ability to ensure that their differences do not impact on their care of the children. Remember that children can either help parents (and grandparents) engineer the transition from one life situation to another, or they can be innocent pawns in a vicious, ongoing struggle. You cannot let your children become the victims of your own parents.

Finally, be sure that any decision you make has the support of the children. After all, it is their holiday that is at stake.

Israel to expand East Jerusalem presence: PM

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has pledged to continue expanding the Jewish presence in eastern Jerusalem.

The prime minister made the statement Sunday after a visit to the site where a Jewish yeshivah student was gunned down and another seriously wounded last week in Jerusalem's Old City.

Gabriel Hirshberg, 26, was killed Nov. 19 by automatic gunfire as he was returning to his dormitory with another student, Binyamin Dell, 18, after studying late at the Ateret Cohanim Yeshiva in the Old City.

Dell was seriously wounded.

"We will honor the memory of Gabi by our settlements of Jerusalem, and our development and building," Netanyahu said.

Israeli security officials suspect that Palestinian police may have been involved in the attack because Hirshberg and Dell were fired on with Kalashnikov rifles, which are carried by Palestinian police, the Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported.

Meanwhile, the director of the Ateret Cohanim Yeshiva, Mati Dan, said his group would respond to Hirshberg's murder by having 18 more Jewish families move into the Muslim Quarter before the end of the year.

On Sunday, some 20 yeshivah students began clearing and renovating one such building.

Dan denied reports that police had forcibly removed the students from the site, saying they left at his directive.

The yeshivah is partially funded by American millionaire Irving Moskowitz, who has bought several homes from Arabs in eastern Jerusalem as part of a campaign to settle Jews there.

Palestinian officials denounced Netanyahu's declaration about building in Jerusalem as a further provocation.

In further violence, an attacker stabbed a yeshivah student in the Muslim Quarter.

The student, who suffered minor wounds to his neck, told police he believed his attacker was a Palestinian.

Jerusalem was at the centre of a dispute last week between the Palestinian Authority and Israel, which vowed to thwart plans by the self-rule government to carry out a census of Palestinians living in the eastern portion of the city.

The self-rule authority agreed in the Oslo accords not to conduct any activity in the eastern part of the capital.

Holocaust memorial unveiled

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Greece has dedicated a memorial to a once-thriving community of Jews that perished in the Holocaust — a move that some said was aimed at repairing the country's ties with Israel.

In a ceremony Sunday in Salonika, Greek President Costis Stephanopoulos unveiled the monument dedicated to the approximately 50,000 Jews from the northern port city who were killed during the 1941 to 1945 Nazi occupation of Greece.

The 10-foot-tall menorah-shaped bronze monument — in which a group of people are depicted reaching heavenward from the flames of the death camps — was erected in a central square in Salonika where local Jews were rounded up before being deported to concentration camps.

Greek Holocaust survivors, three Greek ministers, a U.S. congressional delegation, Israeli representatives and Jewish communal officials from around the world attended the ceremony.

Israeli Health Minister Yehoshua Matza, referring to Salonika's large prewar Jewish population, told attendees, "It is no coincidence that the city was known as the Jerusalem of the Balkans."

Greek government officials said the memorial would help ease a series of misunderstandings with Israel, and put an end to accusations that Greece fostered anti-Semitism.

"It is an important event of historical memory, but also a settlement of misunderstandings" between Greece and the Jewish state, Culture Minister Evangelos Venizelos told reporters.

Greece, which has close relations with most Arab states, did not recognize Israel until the early 1990s and has been at odds with the Jewish state over a number of issues.

Most recently, Athens was upset by a defence agreement reached

The News in Brief

CANADA

Price Library Donated

TORONTO — The library of the late Rabbi Abraham A. Price has been donated to the University of Toronto library by his estate. His library consists of approximately 3,000 volumes and is especially strong in responsa and other legal works. It also includes several hundred books printed before 1800.

The collection is available for consultation at the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library of the U of T, 120 St. George St.

National Gallery Gift

OTTAWA — The National Gallery of Canada's collection of European art has been enhanced by the gift of an early masterpiece, The Departure of Abraham for Canaan, by the Venetian painter Jacopo Bassano. The work was created in 1570-71.

The gift was made by Mr. and Mrs. Michal Hornstein of Montreal in honor of Shirley Thomson's tenure as director.

ISRAEL

Gas Masks in Israel

JERUSALEM — Anxious Israelis have been flocking to gas mask distribution centres despite official assurances that the crisis in Iraq does not threaten Israel.

The Israel Defence Force last week reported a five-fold increase in the number of Israelis who are filing into the centres, spurred by concern that Iraq might launch missiles armed with chemical warheads at Israel.

An army spokesperson said that some 10,000 people were lining up at the centres daily, compared to the 2,500 who came before the recent crisis between Iraq and the United States.

Pinochet Gets Invitation

JERUSALEM — An Israeli company has invited former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet for a private visit to Israel in a bid to sell military vehicles to Chile's defence forces. Pinochet, who ruled Chile from 1973 to 1990, is currently commander of the army.

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz said the Foreign Ministry expressed reservations about hosting Pinochet for an official visit.

WORLD

Name Change

DALLAS — At its 36th biennial convention, the National Federation of Temple Brotherhoods (NFTB) changed its name to the North American Federation of Temple Brotherhoods.

NFTB, an affiliate of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, is a coalition of over 250 Reform Jewish brotherhoods in North America.

A Call for Unity

NEW YORK — Leading rabbinic, lay and Zionist Orthodox organizations have joined together to issue a far-reaching statement calling for civility, tolerance and Jewish unity.

In a full-page ad in the Nov. 17 edition of USA Today, the Orthodox Union, the Rabbinical Council of America, Emunah of America, Poale Agudath Israel and Religious Zionists of America urged continued support for "the Israeli government-appointed Ne'eman Committee, to find common ground among Jews" and appealed to the Jewish people to "keep debate within the family."

Rioters Damage Shul

BRUSSELS — Young rioters have damaged an Orthodox synagogue and injured one person in Brussels.

The rioters tried to set fire to the synagogue's wooden door and threw stones at the building, according to authorities.

Claims Conference

NEW YORK — Rabbi Israel Miller, president of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, urged Holocaust survivors who believe they have claims against wartime insurance companies to participate in an investigation being carried out by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners.

For information, contact the NAIC Working Group at Insurance Commissioner Deborah Senn, Attn: Janice Friebaum, P.O. Box 40255, Olympia, Wash., 98504-0255.

U.S. Sanctions

WASHINGTON — An Israeli citrus company owned by a former Mossad official has been sanctioned by the United States for doing business in Cuba on land expropriated from Americans.

The State Department announced last week that officials of the company, BM Group, will be barred from U.S. territory as a result of the company's violation of the 1996 Helms-Burton Act. The law mandates sanctions against any foreign national who is deemed to be using property confiscated from Americans in Cuba after Fidel Castro took power in 1959.

Swiss To Begin Payout

WASHINGTON — Swiss banks are planning to start paying out some dormant accounts belonging to Holocaust victims by the end of November. The announcement last week by a Swiss official comes just weeks ahead of a conference that will examine the ways American public institutions should deal with Swiss banks.

Postponing Independence Jubilee Kickoff

JERUSALEM — Is Israel ready to celebrate 50 years of statehood?

"The plans are in a state of chaos, and unless something is done very soon to put them back on track, it could be a disappointing year," said one official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The source said the budget for the commemorations has been halved from $70 million to $35 million, but denied reports that it had been slashed to $14 million.

Jubilee planners have been facing budgetary problems, bureaucratic infighting and public indifference – complications that may force Israel to postpone the start of its 50th anniversary celebrations for several months.

Government officials concede that the majority of events have not yet been scheduled, even though festivities are supposed to be launched Dec. 23, the first night of Chanukah.

The array of problems has become so acute that Israeli officials are now seriously considering delaying the year-long series of events until Independence Day, on the Hebrew date of the 4th of Iyar, which falls next year on April 30, and scaling back their planned celebrations in the Diaspora.

Plans for the jubilee began to fall apart earlier this year, when key officials on the organizing committee started squabbling.

Social service cuts put 'burden' on Jewish groups

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Mike Harris government's policy of cutting funds for welfare and other social services is putting an "intolerable burden" on Jewish agencies in Toronto, Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple, told the executive of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, recently.

Tzedek fights Tories' agenda
See page 7

"The provincial government is morally obligated to provide for the poor, weak and sick," Rabbi Marmur said.

Two groups, one of religious leaders, and another of ethnocultural organizations initiated by the CJC, are "frustrated" by Harris's refusal to meet them, he said.

Later, Harold Brief, a Congress executive, said Jewish agencies are awaiting a meeting with the premier to discusss urgent issues of underfunding for social services.

Rabbi Marmur said he was "alarmed" by the number of middle-class people who are taking advantage of a meal and a bed in the temple's "Out of the Cold" program.

"The problems of homelessness and hunger are as much in your neighborhood as they are downtown," he said.

The efforts of 40 churches and the temple to house the homeless will not be enough "and snow is on the way."

Religious leaders decided to speak out publicly because the situation is so urgent and because the premier refused to meet with them, he said.

Reform shuns racists: Manning

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Reform leader Preston Manning vowed to "do everything possible" to ensure that no one with racist or anti-Semitic views is allowed into the party.

Speaking at a Jewish Business Network (JBN) dinner, Manning said, as a boy, he learned this lesson from his late father, Ernest. He recalled how his father, while Social Credit leader during the Depression and later as Alberta premier, "purged" the party of a small element that held "conspiracy theories" about the cause of the country's economic collapse.

The elder Manning went so far as to fire one cabinet minister and some MLAs for their views, and was honored by B'nai Brith for his efforts, the Reform leader said.

"There are those with racist views who will pick on a new party, particularly in times of stress, thinking they can infiltrate and influence it. The best way to inoculate against that is to encourage people who believe in civil liberties and opposing racial prejudice" to join the party.

He encouraged scrutiny of the party's policy and members by anyone concerned that Reform is unfriendly to minorities. "Read our policies, talk to our people, ask the hard questions. If you can show us anything in our statement of principles or policy that is in any way discriminatory, we'll change it."

He boasted that the Reform caucus has more ethnic members than the Bloc Québécois, NDP and Conservatives combined. "We're making progress, but we're conscious that we have to be more representative."

It was a relaxed and conciliatory Manning who addressed the sold-out audience of over 200 at a kosher restaurant in Cote St. Luc. He expressed the wish that the Jewish community get to know him and his party firsthand and asked for its advice in the development of the party's positions. He invited the audience to ask questions on any concerns they have.

He noted that the Jewish community, with its strong tradition of family and volunteerism, could have valuable input into Reform's social policy.

He ventured that there might be a natural affinity between Jews and his party because both are concerned with reform. "In every field, from science and music to law and politics, Jews have been reformers in the sense of changing society for the better. They have had the courage to act and take all the criticism that comes from advocating systemic change."

Elsewhere, Manning reiterated the partitionist position that if "Canada is divisible by a democratic vote then Quebec is divisible by the same mechanism" – or any other province.

"The federal government must have a contingency plan in the event of secession, including the question of boundaries...If the consequences were clearly understood, it would cause the separatists to pull back and the rest of Canada to not say it doesn't matter one way or the other."

Unity issue coursed through GA events

Indianapolis sits upon the mid-western plains of the United States like a neatly stacked configuration of geometric shapes upon a long, smooth, billiard table. There is no confusing where the plains end and the cluster of shapes begins.

In every direction, the horizon is defined by the simple, symmetric joining of earth to sky.

The midwesterners who live and work in Indianapolis are polite and friendly and very proud of their city. They are quick to let you know that Indianapolis, with a population of just over 800,000 people is the 12th largest city in the United States.

It is often called the crossroads of America because it is intersected by more segments of interstate highway than any other metropolitan area in the country. And to further drive home the point – driving is a major pre-occupation in Indianapolis, by the way – for good measure they let you know that more than half of the entire population of the United States lives within a day's drive of Indianapolis.

Among Indianapolis' most celebrated sons have been Steve McQueen, Kurt Vonnegut Jr., Red Skelton and David Letterman.

The porter in the hotel undertook as a personal mission to ensure that I would not return to Canada without knowing that Crest toothpaste was developed at the Indiana University School of Dentistry and that Elvis Presley gave his last performance on June 27, 1977 in Indianapolis.

Two buildings dominate the city's downtown: the state legislature and the domed stadium. They are merely metres apart in a compact area of business shops, hotels, offices and the Indiana Convention Centre.

It was in Indianapolis, in the convention centre occupying an entire city block, that the 66th General Assembly (GA) of the Council of Jewish Federations was held two weeks ago.

Some 4,400 people from six countries attended the GA. Over the course of five days, delegates to the assembly participated in more than 350 different programs of discussions, workshops, seminars, forums, plenary gatherings and entertainment. Every "issue" of modern Jewish life and every aspect of lay and professional involvement in Jewish community affairs was explored.

But there was one issue which coursed through the five-day proceedings like a recurring bolt of electricity constantly charging the crackling air with heavy atmosphere. That issue was: preserving Jewish unity in the face of the anger and the anguish that the majority of affiliated Jews in the Diaspora feel over the legislative attempt by the Orthodox establishment in Israel to prohibit non-Orthodox participation on local religious councils and to codify Orthodox control of conversions in that country.

In response to the proposed legislation, the Reform movement has launched a number of legal challenges in the Supreme Court of Israel.

With legislation pending on the one hand and court challenges on the other, emotions within the three main religious streams are running high.

Those emotions were evident in every room where delegates met at the GA.

The following are some of the notes that I recorded during one of the key presentations on the subject.

Yaacov Ne'eman, Israel's Minister of Finance, chairs the committee created by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to try to find a solution to the "pluralism" impasse. He addressed a plenary session of the assembly and in plain, forceful language presented his views on the matter.

"I have the privilege and the responsibility to chair an historic seven member committee which is trying to grapple with issues that threaten to drive a wedge between many Jews in North America and the State of Israel."

Ne'eman is universally respected and lauded as a serious man, a man of honesty and integrity. Orthodox himself, he is accepted within all streams of Judaism. No-one doubted the sincerity of his words to us.

"Nothing is as important as finding way to heal the rifts which threaten to divide the Jewish people. The Talmud teaches us that one of the most important tasks of man, the reward of which he will only receive in the next world, is to strive for peace between his fellow man.

"History will judge us all by how we respond to this challenge and responsibility."

There was a sense among the delegates, confirmed to the North Americans by their Israeli counterparts, that if anyone can find a common path to compromise, it is Ne'eman.

"We have no choice but to find a solution. Failure to reach an understanding means the division of the Jewish people. The future of the Jewish people depends on the consent and successful conclusion of the committee."

These words were not the "run-of-the-mill" political dinner circuit presentation. They represented the highest policy formulation of the government of Israel on the highest risk issue affecting Israel-Diaspora relations. Because of this fact, the unambiguous way in which the minister spoke was quite impressive. In fact, some delegates inclined to a more pessimistic view of the outcome of the committee's work regretted that by being so atypically unhedging of his bets, Ne'eman had put too much pressure on himself and on the committee.

"When the committee was first formed, many thought that we should recommend some kind of 'technical fix' to this complicated problem. This approach would leave the basic problem unresolved and like a ticking bomb. The problem will only be compounded in the future. We felt it would be irresponsible to leave this controversy hanging over our head. The committee believed that we can and should resolve the problem today in order to unite the Jewish nation all over the world."

With these words, many of the people in the room sat up. Was the minister, was the government overreaching in its aims? By setting their sights so high, were they merely consigning the committee to certain failure?

"Let us all unite. Let us resolve our differences. We need an open dialogue. We must unite the Jewish nation so that we can confront the real problems that threaten our existence in Israel and in the Diaspora."

The deadline for the committee to report the results of its work to the Knesset is Jan. 31, 1998. It is the date all Jews around the world should mark on their calendar.

We wish them success. A great deal depends on it. - - - - MBD

THE SIX BIGGEST MISTAKES PEOPLE MAKE WHEN MANAGING THEIR INVESTMENTS

As Canadians, we should be spending more time thinking about investments and tax strategies.

Most Canadians spend too much time worrying about their RRSP portfolios and not enough time thinking about their overall investment strategy. Remember, your RRSP is limited to $13,500 and if you are in a pension plan, your maximum is even less.

Here are some of the biggest mistakes people make when managing their investments.

3. People look for a guarantee of their dollars, rather than the conservation of their purchasing power.

When you place money in a savings account, GIC, T-bill, etc., you are in essence lending your money to a banking institution. Each year hundreds of thousands of Canadians park billions of dollars in go-nowhere, simple-as-mud investments which don't even return enough to cover inflation or cost-of-living increases; they do however warm the hearts of bankers.

While these types of "safe" investments guarantee you a rate of return in the form of interest, this interest usually fails to return to you the equivalent buying power of your original investment. In other words, as hard as it may be to believe, after you receive your interest on your original investment – 3, 5 or 15 years later – you are actually poorer than when you started.

Yes, the investment was safe. Yes, it grew. But did it accomplish your goal? If your goal is to accrue wealth, which is defined as the ability to purchase goods, you are actually losing ground because your purchasing power has decreased... "Whoops honey, I just shrunk our life-savings!"

Now you begin to see why it is essential to have a portfolio which accrues wealth faster than inflation can diminish it.

4. People forget about hidden government taxes.

When governments cut back or charge more for services, this is really a form of hidden taxation. Smart investors realize that they need to rethink their goals and to make sure their "nest egg" will be sufficient to cover these additional costs. Seniors are particularly vulnerable, as healthcare cutbacks effect the people who use the medical system the most.

Letters blame Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Postal workers and educators have been the target of a letter-writing campaign in which Jews are vilified as the devil and accused of trying to destroy Canadian society.

The typewritten letters urge postal workers not to follow the plans of supposedly Jewish union leaders who "want to destroy the economy, the education, everything else with their strikes."

The letter to teachers and principals suggests that by striking, "you will be helping the devil, the Jews, only, not yourselves, your gentile people, your province or country."

Sgt. Dino Doria of the Metropolitan Toronto Police hate crimes unit said most Metro-area schools received the letters during the strike, but they are coming to the attention of the police as educators get back to work and check their mail.

Police have not yet established a link between the letters, he added, but "there probably is a link."

The letters employ similar language and appear to be the work of a single person, said Danny Fine, interim coordinator of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

While the letters repeat standard anti-Semitic stereotypes of Jews, they are not likely the work of racist organizations. "From the way they look, they're very rough, not polished," Fine said. In addition, the letter to the teachers ends with a compliment to the government of Ontario premier Mike Harris, not a position that would be taken by racist organizations, he said.

Anyone with information about the letters is asked to call police at 416-808-2222.

Varsity apologizes for anti-Semitic ad

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An ad from a notorious American Holocaust denier has left the staff at the University of Toronto student newspaper, the Varsity, with red faces.

Last week, the editor of the student-subsidized newspaper scrambled to explain how a publication that has made an issue out of refusing politically incorrect advertisements could run an ad questioning the Holocaust. The ad offered a $50,000 reward to anyone who could arrange a 90-minute prime time television broadcast of a documentary about Auschwitz. It was submitted by Bradley Smith on behalf of CODOH, the Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust. It refers to "the disputed Auschwitz 'gas chamber'" and calls the Shoah "the Jewish Holocaust story."

Meg Murphy, editor in chief of the Varsity, said the ad does not represent the editorial policy of the paper. In a front page editorial, Murphy apologized to "the university community" for failing to ensure that "hate literature is not propagated through the pages of the Varsity." She said she has also apologized to the Jewish Students Union on campus, as well as to Canadian Jewish Congress. In addition, steps have been taken to brief staff on bringing all new advertisements to the editor's attention, and the full value of the ad, $440, will be donated to the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto.

Despite the Varsity's post-publication efforts, spokespersons for the Jewish community continued to ask how a Holocaust denial ad could be permitted to run.

Noam Samson, past president of the Jewish Students Union (JSU), said he was disturbed by the ad. "What bothered me most was that the Varsity is overly meticulous in not having anything that is not politically correct. Last year, they pulled a tequila ad because of its political content... I don't understand how something like this could pass through, how it could be overlooked and not checked for content.

Moshe Ronen, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said that while he applauded the measures taken by the Varsity in the aftermath of its publication, he said, "That doesn't explain how it got in. Someone did see the ad and if it was an oversight, heads should roll."

Murphy said an unfortunate sequence of events led to the inclusion of the ad. Ads that contain any political content generally are brought to the editor's attention, to make sure they conform to the Varsity's "strict editorial policy," but that was not the case for the CODOH ad, she said.

A new advertising manager accepted the information for the ad and passed it along to a designer, who put it together. The finished product was faxed to Smith, who sent it back with some corrections. The ad ran in the paper without her seeing it, Murphy said.

"I've spoken to the staff. It's highly unfortunate that they didn't recognize it, but it's my responsibility," she said.

Besides the editorial retraction published last week, the Varsity also featured a news story by Murphy describing how the ad was accepted, as well as two articles, by Bernie Farber of Congress and Talia Klein of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, about Holocaust denial.

Farber described Smith as "the college outreach point person on Holocaust denial."

In a story headlined "Holocaust-denier targets campus press," Murphy acknowledged that Smith is targeting Canadian student newspapers "as a means of generating publicity for his crusade."

'Explosion of activity' at OSI, says Nazi hunter

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Eli Rosenbaum

TORONTO — For U.S. Nazi-hunter Eli Rosenbaum, these are particularly stressful times. There don't seem to be enough hours in the day for he and his group of investigators and lawyers to get their work done.

As director of the Office of Special-Investigations (OSI), the U.S. Justice Department's Nazi-hunting and prosecuting unit, Rosenbaum has seen "an explosion of activity" in recent years corresponding to the collapse of the Soviet Union. The unit's historians have had unprecedented access to archival material in eastern Europe that contains "smoking gun after smoking gun." The archives are revealing rosters of killing units and copies of orders that make prosecutions possible, he said

In Toronto to address Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario regional executive and the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada, Rosenbaum said extra work is piling up at the same time that Congressional budget cutters have dictated the reduction of his staff from 51 to 27.

En route to Canada, Rosenbaum studied a file at a Washington airport and then approved launching a case to strip a suspected Nazi persecutor of his U.S. citizenship.

Adding to the unit's workload has been a foray into a new field of investigation. In the last year, the OSI has been asked to do much of the legwork connected with investigations into Nazi-looted gold.

Although the OSI's mandate is to prosecute war criminals, the U.S. government approaches the unit any time an issue related to World War II comes up, he said. As a result, the OSI has found itself involved in reparations issues, a federal inquiry into the limits of medical experiments and into Nazi-looted gold.

The unit has registered some important successes in the new areas, Rosenbaum said. It was able "to prove, definitively, that victim-origin gold was a component of gold shipped by the Third Reich to the Swiss National Bank during World War II."

The unit also found Nazi documents that showed Germany shipped "Juden schmuck" (Jewish loot) to Switzerland.

Other records found in the German Reichsbank contain "some very sickening entries of things unabashedly named dental gold" taken from death camp victims. That gold was smelted and most was sent to Switzerland where it was exchanged for Swiss francs used to purchase war material, he said.

Despite its new area of interest, the OSI continues to investigate war crimes suspects, launching new cases every year. In addition, 24 Nazi suspects, including some from Canada, were prevented from entering the United States last year when their names appeared on a 70,000-name watchlist.

Rosenbaum acknowledged that the OSI has experienced some rough patches in recent years. A U.S. court judgment in the case involving John Demjanjuk, accused of being Ivan the Terrible of Treblinka, stung the unit and affected morale. The court blasted the OSI for withholding evidence from the defence. (Demjanjuk was extradited to Israel on charges of war crimes but the Israeli Supreme Court overturned his conviction. He then moved back to the United States.)

"We've had only successes since then. We recently won a case and the judge, without prompting, went out of his way to compliment the OSI for providing every piece of evidence that helped the defence."

Demjanjuk, meanwhile, has not seen the last of the OSI. He's back in the courts to face allegations he served at the SS training grounds at Trawniki. "That's an independent grounds for deporting him," Rosenbaum said, adding the OSI had received a deportation order against Demjanjuk on that basis in the early 1980s, but it was put on hold pending his extradition to Israel.

In the fiscal year that ended in June, the OSI won seven cases and lost none. The unit currently has 16 cases before the courts.

Branson's emergency hours change

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The emergency department at Branson General Hospital will close at night starting Dec. 10, as a result of a shortage of emergency nurses.

A full-service emergency department will be maintained from 7.30 a.m. to 10 p.m., said Branson vice-president Brian Fenton.

"Only about 12 to 14 people come to the emergency in the night shift and not all of them are true emergencies," he said. About 100 visits a day are made in 24 hours.

But the rest of the hospital's services, despite difficulty in retaining staff, are operating fully.

Advised of a report that Branson may have to close earlier than the planned June 1999 date, Fenton said there is as much likelihood of a later closing as an earlier one.

"It depends on when the other three hospitals are ready to take on our patients," he said. "In some cases they may not be ready by the expected date."

The hospital is planning a public information program on the partial closing of the emergency service.

There are difficulties in keeping enough medical and other staff to keep the hospital operating, Fenton said.

"We have no problem with doctors who are going to other hospitals marked to take our patients, because the shift will be coordinated, but there is a problem with other hospitals who have an immediate vacancy and want it filled."

Meetings are to be held in November and December between officials of the hospitals concerned and Michael Delaney, a consultant, appointed by the Hospital Restructuring Commission.

By the end of December, Branson will have a clearer picture of the time lines involved in closing its services, Fenton said.

Mr. Mark Firestone, Organ transplantation recipient

Rabbi Wayne Allen, Beth Tikvah Synagogue

The multi-organ retrieval and exchange program in Ontario has saved hundreds of lives over the past years, by providing individuals with a new organ and a second chance at life. Currently the number of those awaiting transplantation far exceeds the number of organs that are being donated by potential donors. Can we as Jews donate our organs and still respect the teachings of Halachah?

Grassroots Jewish organization opposes Ontario Tories' agenda

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario Premier Mike Harris may have done more to galvanize grassroots political activism in Ontario than anyone in recent memory.

While large labor unions and community organizations have captured the headlines in opposing the Tories' budget-cutting agenda, smaller grassroots groups have also entered the fray. One such group is Tzedek, a collection of socially conscious Jews who believe the government's program is inconsistent with Jewish ethics and the teachings of the prophets.

About 40 supporters of the group recently held a candlelight vigil outside a Toronto hotel while the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem honored two Righteous Gentiles. The group held its rally to protest the presence of Harris, the evening's guest.

"Inviting Harris was inconsistent with the premise of the dinner," said Charlie Lior, a Tzedek spokesperson. Yad Vashem's promotional material stated that the Holocaust "'compels us to take action against the unjust suffering of innocent people everywhere,'" he said. "No matter what they say, this is not a government that has that as a priority."

Lior, a 46-year-old finance manager of a non-profit housing organization, and Tzedek spokesperson Shlomit Segal dismissed suggestions the Yad Vashem dinner was an inappropriate venue for a political protest. This was not a community event in which the premier is invited year after year, they said. Yad Vashem's advertising, they noted, featured a photograph of the premier and not a picture of those being honored.

While the group supports the goals and values espoused by Yad Vashem, it decided a protest conducted in a respectful manner was appropriate, they added.

The vigil was the latest in a sporadic series of events undertaken by Tzedek, Hebrew for justice. In December 1996, Tzedek co-sponsored a discussion group at the North York Public Library on the effect of government cuts on the Jewish community. It later hosted a cabaret night at the Bloor JCC during the Days of Action protest and it sponsored an educational forum in February 1996 at the Holy Blossom Temple on the impact of government cuts on community groups. Tzedek also participates in the Metro Network for Social Justice.

The organization traces its roots back two years, shortly after the Harris government was elected. At the time, Segal and two friends who work in social services "were very concerned by the provincial and federal cutbacks to health and social [services]." During their informal conversations, they surmised that there were many others in the Jewish community who shared their views but did not see an outlet for their concerns, Segal said.

Shlomit Segal and Charlie Lior of Tzedek

Through an informal network of contacts, the group began to grow and hold meetings that attracted about a dozen people at a time. Lior became familiar with the meetings through his wife Karen, who Segal had met at a feminist conference.

At the meetings, "a lot of people talked about how frustrated they were…and how our response would fit in with being Jewish," Lior said. "Some felt the cuts were inconsistent with Jewish ethics, while others believed the Jewish community does not live in isolation and that Jewish services were being targeted as well as others.

Response to their first program, the Holy Blossom forum, which attracted 200 people, surprised and energized organizers. But instead of formalizing the organization, the core participants in Tzedek decided not to change its status as an informal network of people who gather occasionally.

There are about 60 people on Tzedek's "phone tree" and from one to two dozen people attend meetings regularly. Their goal is to continue to educate the Jewish public about the impact of cost cutting while speaking out to protest the erosion of Ontario's social safety net.

Coaxing compromise

The annual general assembly (GA) of Jewish federations from across North America concluded last week in Indianapolis with numerous displays of individual and collective resolve to find a solution to the "pluralism issue" in Israel before it evolves into a "unity crisis" throughout the Jewish world.

The pluralism/unity issue dominated the assembly. It was the chief subject of discussion and overshadowed the five-day proceedings for the 4,000 people who had gathered to exchange ideas and to air their views on a range of important topics.

As readers of The CJN know, the immediate crisis is a result of two legislative initiatives by the Israeli government's religious coalition partners to exclude non-Orthodox members from local religious councils and to ensure that conversions in Israel will be performed only by the Orthodox rabbinate. To counter these initiatives, the Reform movement has commenced litigation in the Supreme Court.

Emotions in both the Orthodox and non-Orthodox religious worlds in Israel and in the Diaspora are running very high. Differences between the two have turned into a serious divide; and now the divide is threatening to become a chasm.

To prevent any further splintering in the foundation of Jewish peoplehood and to bridge the still-bridgeable divide, the government of Israel appointed a seven-member committee chaired by Yaacov Ne'eman. The committee is charged with finding a compromise. And there was no misunderstanding the urgency and long-range significance of its work.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu set the tone immediately at the first plenary session. "We cannot, we must not allow this crisis to become a disaster. We cannot, we must not allow it to pull us apart. We are determined to reach a consensus between us. It will have to be a creative solution, a Jewish solution, allowing at once continuity and change, involvement and inclusion, alongside stability and purposeful evolution... You are not a third party looking in. You are partners at the table, partners in the common cause of Jewish unity."

Ne'eman spoke to the assembly the following day. "History will judge us all by how we respond to this challenge and responsibility," he said quite plainly. "We have no choice but to find a solution. Failure to reach an understanding means the division of the Jewish people. The future of the Jewish people depends on the consent and successful conclusion of this committee."

On the very day that Ne'eman addressed the assembly, five constituent organizations of the Orthodox establishment in North America sponsored a full page ad in U.S. Today under the banner headline A Call for Jewish Unity. "As Jews who are committed to unity as the underpinning of the existence of the Jewish people, and who value reason and civility, we applaud and encourage the efforts of the Israeli government-appointed Ne'eman Committee to find common ground among Jews concerning personal status issues of conversion, marriage and divorce," the ad began.

Everyone at the GA was hopeful that the committee will succeed. But not everyone was optimistic that it can. Pessimism may be only the smallest remove from realism; but the issues with which the Ne'eman committee is contending are so important and so far-reaching, that we dare not surrender to any feelings of pessimism.

The deliberations of the Ne'eman committee mark the first time since the founding of the rabbinate in pre-state Israel some 80 years ago that the three major streams of Judaism have officially sat at the same table. This is in itself an historic beginning.

Canadian Jewry must follow the example already set and urge our religious leaders to do everything possible to help our counterparts in Israel coax out compromise from this delicate situation.

Restoring the Klondike Jewish cemetery

On a ridge overlooking the Yukon gold rush city of Dawson, lies the well-kept burial lots of the Catholic, Anglican, Mason and Yukon Order Of Pioneers; and a sparsely wooded lot that hides the Jewish Bet Chaim (House of the Living) Cemetery. Established in 1902 by the Jewish Society of Dawson for the burial of Isaac Simons, a young prospector from New York who had drowned, the site has seven graves, but only one stone marker remains, the one for Samuel Packer, a Dawson merchant who died in 1918.

This coming summer will mark the 100th anniversary of the Klondike Gold Rush, and Dawson City will commemorate its founding with numerous centennial events. An effort to restore the Jewish cemetery will be made. All interested parties are welcome to help, and Jewish youth are invited to join the cleanup effort.

Another proof of soap from Auschwitz

Re: your article claiming there was no proof of soap being made from human remains by the Nazis in the concentration camps (CJN, Oct. 9). I have seen the article personally in Bistitza, Transylvania in 1946.

Returnees from Auschwitz brought the soap with them for burial in our city and it was called "RIF" zeif, which stands for Rein Judisches Feten, or Pure Jewish Fats.

The knowledge of this fact was widespread in our district.

All Jews deserve religious freedom

Re: Richie Cohen's letter (CJN, Nov. 6) on "Israel has right to say who is a Jew."

Members of the Orthodox rabbinate in Israel are claiming that only their definition of who is a Jew is valid. They are also claiming that only they should decide who may participate in conversions to Judaism, who and how couples may marry, how individuals may be buried and who shall be eligible to serve on religious councils, in many cases despite Israeli Supreme Court decisions to the contrary.

They are urging the government to enact these beliefs and practices into legislative decree and insisting that if Benjamin Netanyahu fails to do so, their parties will leave the coalition and his government will fall.

The Israeli government may exercise its right to say within its boundaries, who is a Jew according to Orthodox definitions. However, if it chooses to do so, its definition will exclude most of Diaspora Jewry in the process and will have enacted the most divisive laws affecting all the Jewish people everywhere in the world.

The New Israel Fund (NIF) challenges these assertions in the name of Jewish diversity, in support of pluralism in Israel and Diaspora life and in fulfilling the dream of establishing a free and democratic Israel.

The New Israel Fund message is that religious freedom is the right of each and every Jew. Orthodox Jews must be able to observe their beliefs in freedom and dignity, with no interference from anyone. But all other Jews, too, must be accorded that same right. The New Israel Fund neither favors nor opposes any particular religious view. We are an inclusive organization and our supporters come from all streams of Judaism.

Dr. Ralph Garber, President
New Israel Fund of Canada
Toronto

Religious pluralism would divide Israelis

The Jewish people survived for 20 centuries only because of its religion, a religion based on observance of the Torah. The New Israel Fund is going on a campaign today to preach against "the Orthodox establishment" and for "pluralism and religious freedom."

I was shocked to read the inaccuracies and distortions in its full page ad (CJN, Nov. 13). The so-called "religious establishment" is not seeking new powers in Israel; it is seeking to maintain the status quo, i.e. one set of rules for Jewish religious observance. "For years the Orthodox establishment has determined how Israelis could get married or divorced..." Yes, and for 20 centuries Jews have been married or divorced according to these same religious laws.

The New Israel Fund forgot to inform us that the "Orthodox establishment" has also ensured that the day of rest in the Jewish state is the Jewish Sabbath, and that public institutions offer kosher food so that no Jew should ever be excluded. Let us not obfuscate the issue: the code words "religious pluralism" mean Reform Judaism; the New Israel Fund is appealing to us for our financial gifts to help promote the "religious" freedom offered by the American Reform Judaism establishment. This "religious pluralism" is a religious smorgasbord that may survive in America, but in Israel it would surely divide the Jewish people beyond repair.

In the words of Prof. Shlomo Avineri: "The synagogue I don't attend should be Orthodox." If an Israeli Jew goes through a religious marriage or a get, she/he wants to know that it is indeed valid in Jewish religion. There may be various ways of feeling Jewish, of living one's Judaism, and a Jew may choose not to follow religious practices, to go to the beach on Shabbat or dance in a disco on Friday night. There cannot however be but one Jewish religion.

Perspectives

The vote that preceded the state

Fifty years ago on Nov. 29 the General Assembly of the United Nations voted in favor of partitioning what was left of mandatory Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab homeland. The outcome was not assured until the final moments. The drama was high, the tension leading up to the vote was at times unbearable.

The following excerpts are from two people who were involved with the birth of Israel.

'It was an incredible sight'

The voting took place at Lake Success in New York on Nov. 29. Like everyone else in the Yishuv, I was glued to the radio with pencil and paper, writing down the votes as they came through. Finally, at about midnight our time, the results were announced: 33 nations (including the United States and the Soviet Union) were in favor of the partition plan; 13, including all the Arab states, opposed it; 10, including Great Britain, abstained.

I immediately went to the compound of the Jewish Agency building, which was already jammed with people. It was an incredible sight: hundreds of people, British soldiers among them, holding hands, singing and dancing, with truckloads of more people arriving at the compound all the time.

I remember walking up to my office alone, unable to share in the general festivity. The Arabs had turned the plan down and talked only of war. The crowd, drunk with happiness, wanted a speech and I thought it would be wicked to dampen the mood by refusing. So from the balcony of my office I spoke for a few minutes. But it was not really to the mass of people below me that I talked; it was, once again, to the Arabs.

"You have fought your battle against us in the United Nations," I said. "The United Nations – the majority of countries in the world – have had their say. The partition plan is a compromise: not what you wanted, not what we wanted. But let us now live in friendship and peace together."

That speech was hardly the solution for our situation. Arab riots broke out all over Palestine the next day (seven Jews were killed in an Arab ambush on a bus) and on Dec. 2, an Arab mob set the Jewish commercial centre in Jerusalem on fire, while British police stood by, interfering only when the Haganah tried to take action.

We were, of course, totally unprepared for war.

(Excerpted from My Life, by Golda Meir, G.B. Putnam's Sons, New York, 1975)

Facing a great challenge

I write this on the day following the historic decision of the United Nations. As the year 1947 draws to a close, the Jewish people, and particularly the Zionists, face a very great challenge. Before another year is over, we must found a Jewish state; we must prepare a constitution, set up a government, organize our defences and begin to reconstruct the present National Home so as to make it capable of absorbing, according to the plan, some six to eight thousand immigrants a month…

[Our] goal is the building of a high civilization based on the austere standards of Jewish ethics. From these standards we must not swerve…

The prophets have always chastised the Jewish people with the utmost severity for this tendency; and whenever it slipped back into paganism, whenever it reverted, it was punished by the stern God of Israel.

Whether prophets will once more arise among the Jews in the near future it is difficult to say. But if they choose the way of honest and hard and clean living, on the land in settlements built on the old principles, and in cities cleansed of the dross which has been sometimes mistaken for civilization; if they centre their activities on genuine values, whether in industry, agriculture, science, literature or art; then God will look down benignly on His children, who, after a long wandering, have come home to serve Him with a psalm on their lips and a spade in their hands, reviving their old country and making it a centre of human civilization.

In tribute and commemoration

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

Earlier this month, I was privileged to speak at a tribute celebrating the 85th birthday of an esteemed scholar, community leader and fellow columnist, Rabbi Gunther Plaut. The event took place on the second anniversary of the funeral of Yitzhak Rabin, against the backdrop of commemorative services and programs in Israel, at the Knesset, across the educational system and in the media. In a poll published that week 41 percent of Israelis said they felt the country had not learned the lessons of that tragic event and 47 percent said they felt it could happen again.

In a tribute to Rabbi Plaut, and to mark the anniversary of Rabin's assassination, I am sharing with you excerpts from my comments:

What is it that makes some people an icon, that sets them apart from many other accomplished leaders. Rabbi Plaut, in everything that you have undertaken, you have occupied the highest moral ground... There are three essential qualities that, for me, represent the living legacy you have given us: First, your abiding love and respect for your fellow man and woman, and your fellow Jew. Throughout your public life, you have fought for the klal, the whole. You accept the foibles of your people and the frailties of human nature, but you exhort us to rise above these and to compromise for the sake of the public good.

Second, is your profound sense of history. You know that we are but a moment in time on a vast continuum of history and human experience. You know that even as we chart our destiny, we live with the consequences of past decisions, and that in turn, the decisions we make will shape the future.

Third, is the positive, spiritual value you bring to your Jewish identity. You do not define your Judaism in response to external perceptions or persecution. Rather, your Jewish identity and pride come from deep within... For you, Judaism is an evolving truth that we define and redefine in each generation, as steadfast bearers of a unique heritage that is eternal...

And so we have turned to you for your leadership whenever the moment has been too joyous or too painful for simple words. And you have spoken b'kol gadol, in a great, strong voice. You help us feel the moment in celebration or in sorrow. You help us understand.

Just two years ago, your voice spoke to us as we reeled from the shock of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination. On that fateful night when Israel lost its innocence forever, a limb was torn from us. If, indeed, a community is measured, not by how it agrees, but by how it disagrees, then Israelis feared that night that they had lost the ability to disagree. This was the dagger that pierced Israel's soul...

Rather than saying, as many do, that Israelis have been quick to forget that bloody night, I would argue that the Israeli community is still in a state of deep shock. That is why it seems fatigued, weary; and why it remains as divided as it was then.

To heal a trauma, you must believe that you can return to life and reaffirm your commitment to what was. Israel has not yet made that reaffirmation. I speak not of legitimate political differences about the future of the territories, nor of the equally legitimate debate about the contours of religious pluralism in Israel. I speak, rather, of the commitment to an overarching common purpose, to a whole that is greater than the sum of its parts, to a community, a kehillah.

If for Israelis, the challenge of earlier generations was the challenge of survival, then the challenge for today is the challenge of competing visions and coexistence. And for us who participate in that debate, the challenge is to rise above these differences and to find a continued commitment to an Israel that is forever.

The age of innocence is past for Israel, and with that loss, for Israelis and for us, comes the painful, mature recognition of that society's shortcomings. And we must decide if we can transform that early, romantic love into a more sober, sometimes tough, but lasting attachment...

Rabbi Plaut, you stand apart, unique in your embodiment of what so many of us feel we've lost – a sense of community and common purpose. Everything you stand for is the antithesis of the blow to Israel's soul that occurred two years ago. You have said that as a people we have never governed ourselves very well. It is precisely the quality of our governance, as a people and in the State of Israel, that is being tested today...

Two years ago, at that historic community rally when we came together to mourn a murder most foul, Gunther Plaut's strong, wise voice issued the ultimate charge to my generation of Jews and Israelis. "Just remember this," he said. "Whether we as a people shall live is up to God, but whether we shall live as one people of divided against each other is up to us."

We must be worthy of the task.

L'Affaire Diana

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Enough time has passed since the tragic occurrence in a Paris tunnel that took the life of the most highly publicized woman in the world. Not long thereafter, Mother Teresa died in India. The contrast between the two women was obvious and stark. I decided that since everybody was writing about them, I would bide my time and wait until my perspective had lengthened and emotion was more subdued. Then I dropped the idea of writing about them altogether; enough was enough.

However, the other day a newsletter entitled the Prager Perspective reached me, and I noticed that my friend Dennis Prager had devoted the entire issue to the princess. His subheading was "Why so much grief?" The popular public speaker, broadcaster, author and journalist concluded that there were nine different reasons why so many people exhibited so much interest and evinced so much grief.

The reasons he enumerates are the following: she was young; she was the mother of two young children; she was beautiful; fairy tales should not have an unhappy ending; she was a good soul; she was accessible and troubled; we care about those we know about; many people, especially women, shared Diana's pain; and she had charisma.

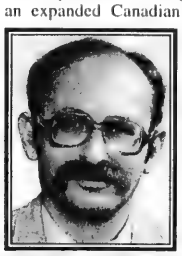
I'm sure Prager could have added some other reasons, chief amongst them the role played by the media. They jumped on it with unheard vim and vigor. Pretty soon everyone – even those who never worried or cared about Diana when she was alive – was drawn into the maelstrom of discussion, reportage, pictures and more pictures, headlines and broadcasts about paparazzi. The finger of guilt was pointed at them, at the allegedly drunk driver, and at the fact that only the one who wore a seat-belt survived and the others did not, which was portrayed as an indication that the rest of the passengers courted death subliminally.

The first of the nine reasons that Prager noted is, to me, the most cogent. In addition to being the most photographed woman in the world in her lifetime, the fact that she was young played, in my opinion, the major role in the reporting of her tragic death.

We live in a youth-oriented culture. Young is not only beautiful (disregarding the fact that old people also can be beautiful), for beauty is defined as identical with youth. Middle-aged people, let alone oldsters, have no attraction for the population as a whole. Youth has all the advantages, and even young people's lack of experience no longer counts. Where formerly the aged were accorded respect for their wisdom, that is no longer so. They are considered "over the hill" in every way and wisdom lies with the young, who, even lacking experience, have most if not all of the answers.

No wonder that Mother Teresa, an old woman, garnered little space, at least in comparison. And yet it is also a fact that long after the princess is forgotten, it will be the old lady that will still be remembered. The Torah says that the poor will remain with us and therefore caring for the poor will always be needed in the human condition.

The War Museum and the Holocaust



By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

A recent story in the Globe and Mail described a growing conflict about a proposed Holocaust gallery to be part of an expanded Canadian War Museum in Ottawa. According to Ian Inrig, dominion secretary of the army, navy and air force veterans in Canada, some Canadian veterans were opposed to the inclusion of the Holocaust memorial.

His group does favor a Holocaust memorial, but not as part of the Canadian War Museum, which should be devoted to Canadian military history. Save for the fact that some Canadian troops were involved in liberating the camps, there was indeed little direct link between the Holocaust and Canada's military experience during the war.

Opposing the veterans are officials of the War Museum. The chair of the fundraising campaign reportedly sees the Holocaust Gallery as "critical to explaining conflict in the 20th century." Another official feels the War Museum is the "appropriate place" to tell the Holocaust story.

A cynic might argue that one factor behind the museum's sensitivity to the Holocaust and the desire to include it as part of the expanded facility is the fundraising campaign. Some organizers might well feel that wealthy Jews could be more effectively solicited for contributions if they knew that a Holocaust gallery would be an important new element of the estimated $12-million expansion. Certainly Jewish philanthropists in North America have been eager contributors to Holocaust memorials and museums. Luckily, I am not a cynic...

Some years ago, I visited the impressive Australian War Museum in Canberra. By coincidence, I was in Australia over ANZAC Day, comparable to Remembrance Day, and was awed by the enthusiastic parade celebrating Australia's and New Zealand's war efforts. Perhaps the fact that Australians had actually been bombed by the Japanese and feared invasion makes them appreciate their veterans more. Whatever the reason, Canada's war museum and commemorations just don't compare. I welcome the expansion.

By further coincidence, there was a Holocaust exhibit on display in the Canberra museum's basement. I think it was not permanent, but there on loan. While at first it seemed incongruous, I realized that linking the Holocaust to the venerated Australian war effort certainly did not hurt educational objectives aimed at the wider non-Jewish community.

There are many possible ways in which the Holocaust can be memorialized. One is through a specific Holocaust museum, like Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Museum in Washington or the smaller one in Montreal. They are highly effective and pay due homage to the victims. But they risk perpetuating a distortion of Jewish history and experience by emphasizing six years out of millennia. Also, no matter how well presented – and they are – they may underemphasize universal themes or lessons.

A second way to memorialize the Holocaust is as part of a broad museum of Jewish history or civilization. This would recognize that the Holocaust, or even anti-Semitism, is not the totality of the Jewish experience. Like the first option, it would also accentuate the Jewish specificity of the tragedy at the risk of losing universality.

A third would be to include it in a more general museum, such as the Los Angeles Museum of Tolerance or a general museum of civilization. This would situate the Holocaust within a broader framework, suggesting that its lessons are generalizable, that it can be compared with but is not identical to other mass tragedies and that it represented a failure in basic human culture. While laudable, these risk diluting the Jewish essence of the tragedy. After much reflection, I am still undecided about whether it is best to emphasize the unique or the universal regarding the Shoah.

A fourth, as I saw in Australia and might develop in Ottawa, would be to place it in a military museum, either for pragmatic convenience or to stress a linkage between hatred and war. While the link is more of a stretch, I do not doubt that much good would ensue.

Reasonable observers can come up with their own favored option for Holocaust commemoration. But it would be tragic to see a growing rift between veterans and museum officials, and possibly involving the Jewish community, over this matter. The blessed memories of both the Canadian veterans and the European Jews who perished deserve better.

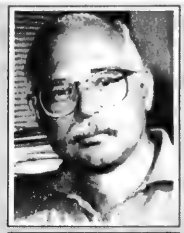
Palestine partition plan crowned Zionist diplomacy

Fifty years ago this week, on Nov. 29, 1947, the United Nations General Assembly, by a two-thirds majority, passed



By Sheldon Kirshner

one of the most significant resolutions in modern history — the Palestine partition plan.

The resolution envisaged a Palestinian and a Jewish state in Palestine, leaving Jerusalem and its hinterland internationalized. Most Jews regarded the controversial resolution as the apotheosis of Zionist diplomacy, but the Arab world expressed outrage and mobilized for war.

In May 1948, the Zionist leadership in Palestine, populated by 1.2 million Arabs and 650,000 Jews, unilaterally declared independence. In response, several Arab nations, spearheaded by Egypt and Syria, launched an invasion to snuff out the newly created state of Israel.

Against all odds, Israel prevailed, but not without sustaining severe casualties. Israel defended the territory it had been assigned by the UN, and gained still more by the time the fighting subsided in 1949. For the Arabs, the war — the first of six — was an exercise in humiliation. For the Palestinians, however, the war was a disaster, a lost opportunity of forming a sovereign state.

The seeds of the 1947 resolution were planted by Britain's decision to relinquish its League of Nations mandate in Palestine. Britain, in World War I, had wrested Palestine from the Ottoman Turks. But for Britain, Palestine proved to be more of a burden than a blessing, as the forces of Zionism and Arab nationalists repeatedly clashed.

Britain sought political solutions to defuse the friction. In 1936, the year the Arab Revolt broke out, the Peel Commission broached the idea of partitioning Palestine into Arab and Jewish enclaves. But the 1938 Woodhead Commission found the scheme unworkable.

Britain emerged from World War II exhausted and virtually bankrupt, with a manifest desire to rid itself of troublesome colonies. Palestine was particularly problematic. After 1945, the Irgun and the Stern Gang, exponents of Revisionist Zionism, escalated their armed attacks and campaign of terrorism against British rule. In 1947, the weary British government referred the problem to the UN and began evacuating civilian personnel.

Stuck with a hot potato, the UN established the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP) to study the issue. Meanwhile, tensions continued to flare in Palestine.

In August, UNSCOP produced a majority and a minority report. The first recommended partition. The second called for federation. The Arab League, as well as the Palestinians, rejected both reports.

The two superpowers — the Soviet Union and the United States — had an impact on events. Moscow, eager to eliminate British influence in the Middle East, endorsed the "aspirations of the Jewish people to establish their own state." Washington, initially, was more circumspect. President Harry Truman and Congress were basically sympathetic to Jewish statehood, but the State Department and the Pentagon were concerned that a pro-Zionist policy would be prejudicial to American interests in the region. In the face of their objections, Truman wavered but finally came down on the Zionist side. The death of six million Jews in the Holocaust was certainly one important component in his deliberations.

Under the UN partition resolution, the Arab and the Jewish state were to be linked in an economic union and would share a common currency and joint railways and roads. The Jewish state would encompass 5,500 square miles and the Arab state would embrace 4,500 miles.

After much debate, the UN approved the resolution by a vote of 33 to 13. Canada, the United States, the Soviet Union, most European states and the Latin American bloc supported the resolution. Apart from Muslim and Asian states, Greece and Cuba voted against it. Britain abstained.

Infuriated, the Arabs resorted to violence to quash the dream of Jewish statehood. Palestinian irregulars carried out hit-and-run assaults on Jewish settlements. Soon, Arab armies joined the battle. In Arab lands, Jews were attacked.

On Nov. 15, 1988, the PLO, belatedly, recognized the partition resolution as a fait accompli. Two weeks ago, Yasser Arafat asserted that he would declare Palestinian statehood in 1999. Things have come full circle.

A child of the Holocaust

Poland has gone through a succession of governments since the collapse of Communism almost a decade ago. The latest Polish government, led by Prime Minister Jerzy Buzek, has a new foreign minister. He is none other than Bronislaw Geremek, a scholar, a deputy in the lower chamber of parliament, a former chair of the foreign affairs committee and, last but not least, a child of the Holocaust.

Born in Warsaw in 1932, Geremek is believed to be the first person of Jewish origin to hold that high-profile portfolio. He was brought up by a Catholic family in whose care he was entrusted by his parents. They were murdered during the German occupation of Poland.

A distinguished historian, Geremek was a confidant of Lech Walesa, Poland's former president, and a leading strategist of the Solidarity trade union movement, which set into motion the process which unseated Polish Communism.

Apparently raised as a Catholic, Geremek has never concealed his Jewish antecedents. Indeed, some regard him as a "Pole of Jewish background." When his appointment was announced, Henryk Jankowski, a prominent Catholic priest who does not have a reputation as a philo-Semite, reportedly declared, "The Jewish minority should not be accepted in our government."

Jankowski's outburst was criticized by a leading cleric in the Catholic church, but by then the damage had already been done. Such displays of blatant anti-Semitism, in a country where millions of Jews perished in Nazi concentration camps and ghettos, can leave the impression that the struggle for human rights and the battle against xenophobia and racism is woefully incomplete in Poland.

As far as Geremek is concerned, he is anything but unique. Thousands of Jewish children owe their lives to Poles who, at great risk to themselves and their families, hid them during the Holocaust. Some were reclaimed by their parents after the war, but others, like Geremek, were totally assimilated into Polish Catholic culture. Still others, the sons and daughters of Jewish Communists, have only recently come out of the closet.

These crosscurrents were the subject of a set of speeches delivered recently by Julian and Fay Bussgang during Holocaust Education Week in Toronto. The event was sponsored by the Jewish Genealogical Society.

The Bussgangs are ardent genealogists. During the course of several trips to Poland since 1993, they have met numerous people whose personal histories are remarkably like Geremek's.

Several years ago, a group of these individuals, ranging from a medical doctor to a priest, committed their experiences to paper. Now Julian Bussgang, an American born in Lvov, has translated their stories into English. Northwestern University Press plans to publish the collection next April under the title of The Last Eyewitnesses: Children of the Holocaust Speak. It should be intriguing.

Wartime reminiscences include dread adventures

I Wish It Were Fiction: Memories 1939-1945* by Elsa Thon (Mekler & Deahl, $15 paperbound).

Just 16 when the war broke out, the author, living in Poland, underwent a series of vicissitudes and dread adventures. These included the use of forged documents, the constant fears of a fugitive, life in the Krakow ghetto, the miseries of labor camps and the rigors of a forced march. Death was never far away.

Arriving one day at the Plaszow internment camp, she found an SS man guarding the gate, speaking on the telephone in a nearby booth. "Wanting only to continue his conversation, he waved the entire group of almost 100 people to the barrier. A Jewish policewoman urged the group to run as fast as they could from the Nazi. She explained later, 'I ordered you to run so as not to give him a chance to change his mind. You are the lucky ones. Yesterday a group of people were taken from the checkpoint directly to that hill and every one of them was shot."

Eventually, the war over, she made her way to a camp in Germany under American supervision. She emigrated to Canada from Argentina in 1980.

Each chapter in this absorbing volume of reminiscences is followed by a poem that evokes feelings and emotions of the years filled with danger and uncertainty. "It took courage to live with pain/ I begged forgiveness of those gone away/ My destiny was not to die."

I Begin To Understand* by Shula Robin (Claremont Publishing, $12 paper).

The poet of this slender volume is rich in years and wisdom. She responds to the joys of friendship, the compensations of music and the paradoxes of a conflicted society.

She is challenged by the gift of a computer, saddened by tragic events in Rwanda, replenished by the gifts of prodigal nature and comforted by her bed as "a constant and intimate friend."

She confesses to her readers: "I feel so small,/ a mere speck on earth,/ a remote relative,/ guest of Adam and Eve's/ Garden of Eden –/ grateful to be a part/ of the magnificent creation."

In Herzl's footsteps

One hundred years ago, Jews from Germany, Austria, Russia, Poland and other countries met in the Stadtcasino in Basel, Switzerland, in order to discuss a "new solution to the Jewish question" and to lay the foundation for the World Zionist Organization.

On the occasion of the centennial of that first Zionist Congress, I found myself in that same Stadtcasino at an academic congress held at the initiative of the University of Basel, in cooperation with scholars from Hebrew University in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv University, Prague, Bern, London, Warsaw, Essen, Heidelberg and Vienna.

I had come to Basel not only because Zionism has played such a major role in my life and in my father's life before me, but also to make a statement with my life. To be there in Switzerland at this time, when the Swiss have so rudely disrupted the Jewish consciousness by revealing that they had willfully withheld knowledge of Holocaust victims' bank accounts for 50 years, was an opportunity for me, along with other Jews, to be able to say to the Swiss, am Yisrael chai, the people of Israel lives, and we are here and we are alive.

Staying at the Drei Konige Hotel, that ancient (1086) and still glorious hotel of the Three Kings, I drank in the aura of Theodor Herzl, who had stayed in that same hotel 100 years ago. His room is preserved as it was then; even his laundry bill from his second visit in 1898 is framed on the wall. I peered from his balcony out onto the darkly flowing Rhine and felt Jewish history touching me. His room is opened only by special permission.

In Basel, I found paradox. Of some 1,500 Jews in attendance, about half were Israelis (a good portion of the Knesset and the Jewish Agency hierarchy among them). Large youth groups came from South America, from all over Europe (including Hungary) and from South Africa, but there were relatively few North American Jews.

When I went to the podium to congratulate Prof. Irwin Cotler of Montreal and tell him how proud he had made me feel as a fellow Canadian, he replied that we were the only two Canadians there, and were probably the only two who knew about the conference! (I did discover, when I returned to Toronto, that there were a few other Canadians present.)

The Basel Jewish community welcomed us to their synagogue, the same synagogue where Herzl had an aliyah in 1897, which he compared in his diary to a thrill equal to that of the Congress! An entire floor of the Stadtcasino was turned into an excellent kosher restaurant for our convenience. There is no kosher slaughtering permitted in Switzerland; so everything was imported from France. We appreciated this effort even more therefore.

Security was very tight. Jews are news, after all, and the Swiss wanted to avoid any incident by having all delegates wear special badges and by bringing in enough uniformed police and military to equal almost one guard per delegate – 1,080 soldiers for 1,500 delegates! That doesn't take into account, of course, all the Israeli military who were present too. One Swiss guard carried a clipboard which read "FBI Academy!"

But the clearest message from the Basel Jewish community was that what I thought was black and white concerning Switzerland's "neutrality" was not so black and white at all. Germany's Black Forest sits directly on Basel's border and there is a railway station within Basel that was and is still officially German territory.

Borders in Switzerland, where they touch France and Germany, are not the same as Canada's border touching the United States. We in North America cannot extrapolate our understanding of borders to Europe. The history is different, the geography is different and the concept of neutrality is different. A nation can only be neutral, after all, if other nations allow it.

When we sat in the Stadtcasino and heard Maximillian Shell (a world renowned Swiss actor, but not a Swiss Jew) pause in his reading from Herzl's diary to say, "I must tell you from my heart that Switzerland does accept responsibility for history," we all cheered. When we stood to sing Hatikvah in that room, with Herzl's eyes looking into our eyes, we wept.

Later at the Kunsthalle (the symphony hall) we heard the Basil symphony play with Swiss klezmorim Yiddish melodies and songs of Israel. Eighty Jewish children from Basel sang Al haNissim, (For All the Miracles), a moment they will always remember. I knew then why I had travelled so far to share this event with other Jews. I did it for my grandchildren.

In the beginning...

By RABBI MAURY KELMAN

We currently find ourselves reading Genesis, the timeless bedrock of our nation that continues to elucidate and animate millions of lives thousands of years after the events.

Writers throughout history, from John Milton to Thomas Mann, have distilled Bereshit's teachings in their creation, making it perhaps the most widely read and discussed best-seller of all times.

As Jews, we study the messages of Genesis, not only when we read its 12 weekly portions in the synagogue, but throughout the year, comparing, for example, the often cryptic commentary of the 11th-century Rashi with the more expansive Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch of 19th century Germany.

Why? Is it the incomparable chutzpah of the first Jewish advocate, fearless while defending the people of Sodom before God? Or perhaps we are spellbound by the vision of Abraham leading his beloved son to the altar. Or is it the incomparable drama of the Joseph story that seizes our emotions and minds? Clearly, Bereshit encompasses all of these magnetizing nuanced narratives, which can guide the greatest of creative writers.

The uniqueness of the first book of the Torah, however, stems from the greatness of our forefathers and mothers, who truly remain alive after more than 3,000 years.

Generally, we may understand our ultimate role models in two distinct ways. Certain commentators and contemporary Jews feel that we cannot use regular tools to explore their lives. If Abraham seemed unwise in putting his wife in a difficult position in Egypt, it is only because we, as regular humans, cannot perceive Abraham's wisdom and surely have no right to judge him on our terms. The same is true in the few instances when we may detect a flaw in the protagonists of Bereshit – the problem is in our understanding, not in their conduct. We place our ancestors on a pedestal, offering a transcendent vision of human greatness.

Others, notably Nachmanides, the great 13th-century Spanish rabbi, doctor and exegete, feel that it is indeed valid to view our forefathers and mothers as human beings who struggle to overcome the many obstacles placed in their paths. According to this view, they are not, as one contemporary rosh yeshivah explained "ossified statues of petrified tzadkut." Nachmanides, for example, feels that both Abraham and Sarah did err, albeit unintentionally, on certain occasions.

While both viewpoints are valid in Jewish tradition, the latter perspective may be more compelling to the contemporary Jew in day to day life. While the almost meta-human viewpoint surely commands our respect and awe, it may represent an unreachable goal for the typical person who does not spend the majority of his or her time studying Torah or contemplating God.

However, when we recognize Abraham as someone who wandered, in the words of Nachmanides, as a lost sheep before achieving greatness, or Jacob as a hard working shepherd who overcame seemingly debilitating obstacles to raise a successful family, our ancestors suddenly become more accessible to us. They had to work hard, often triumphing over internal doubts and past errors, to attain their lofty goals.

The vast majority of us can only dream about the accomplishments of our nation's architects. We can, however, gain strength and inspiration from our ancestors' dogged determination and their optimistic attitude in the face of hardships. We can transform our lives and achieve our personal, familial and community goals by continuing to study and to inculcate these characteristics in our own lives. Our goals are not to be like Abraham and Sarah, but rather in the same way that they fulfilled their specific missions, we must fulfil ours by converting our potential into reality.

On giving tzedakah

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Rosh Hashanah is well behind us. But the other new year draws near and with it the last-minute impulse to donate to charity. So, I'd like to take a look at some of the sites on the Jewish Highway where you can pick up background information on charity and perhaps even leave some tzedakah behind.

Over the next three weeks, we'll examine some of the ethical issues in giving (and taking) money; get tips on how to inspire tzedakah in children; and even find locations on the World Wide Web which you can donate charity right from the convenience of your keyboard.

Actually, charity really isn't a very good translation of the word "tzedakah." According to Albert Vorspan, tzedakah literally means "righteousness. Tzedakah," he says, "is not an act of condescension from one person to another who has a lower social and economic status. Tzedakah is the fulfilment of an obligation to a fellow being with equal status." You can find this definition and others at [http://www.jtsa.edu/melton/tzedaka/quotes.html].

In a very interesting overview of The Economics of Tzedakah [http://swfs.org/5758erh.htm], Rabbi Gary M. Bretton-Garanatoor of New York's Stephen Wise Free Synagogue looks at the example set by Abraham.

"We know little of Abraham's early life, and one might wonder why Abraham was singled out to become G-d's partner in the Covenant. We learn from the text that, "Vayach'shveha lo tzedakah – G-d considered Abraham on account of his righteousness" (Genesis 15:6) [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/genesis/torah/15061508.htm].

"Throughout the Torah, tzedakah, acts of righteousness, are tied to the Hebrew term mishpat, legal justice, so that we learn that doing what is right and just is a legal obligation."

One of the most thought-provoking articles that I came across did not address the giving of tzedakah but the taking of it. In When Good Money Comes from Bad People [http://www.jtsa.edu/pubs/jtsmag/vol6iss3/forum.html], three professionals look at Jewish sources to help grapple with the ethics of accepting donations from morally questionable sources. What would you do?

Roger David Carasso asks a couple of other difficult questions in Directed Tzedakah: A Torah Look into Where Tzedakah Should be Given [http://www.carasso.com/roger/charity.html]. How much should you give and to whom? Similarly, Stewart Abrams asks Do American Jews have a Tzedakah Responsibility to Non-Jewish Poor? at [http://www.mkorshalom.org/tzedakah.htm].

Finally, take a look at Arthur Kurzweil's Brother, Can You Spare a Dime: The Treatment of Beggars According to Jewish Tradition [http://www.ajritz.com/jew/brother.htm]. Kurzweil says that although "the organized Jewish community has gotten the mitzvah of giving tzedakah down to a virtual science," he has always been confused and inconsistent in his treatment of beggars.

He poses 15 questions, such as "What if they are all fakes or frauds?" "Shouldn't these beggars be supported by official agencies?" and "Should I buy them a cup of coffee because they'll probably spend it on booze anyway?" Kurzweil, who is not a rabbi, but a well-known Jewish genealogist, clearly spent a great deal of effort sifting through traditional sources which demand compassion for the needy.

For more definitions of tzedakah, see [http://user03.blue.aol.com/jewfaq/tzedakah.htm], [http://linex1.linex.com/~yrice/tzedakah.html] and [http://www.joi.org/edutain/rosh/tzedakah.htm].

Next week, we'll continue our look at tzedakah and the Jewish Highway with suggestions about how to decide who to help.

Rabbi's spiritual odyssey included Buddhist sojourn

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Alan Lew

TORONTO — "I'm a little slow on the uptake," joked Rabbi Alan Lew. "I had to go to a Buddhist monastery for 10 years before I figured out I was Jewish."

Ironically, it was his involvement in Zen Buddhism that led him back to his Jewish roots, he said at a recent program at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Rabbi Lew, the spiritual leader of a large Conservative congregation in San Francisco and president of the Board of Rabbis of Northern California, was the first guest three weeks ago in a weekly four-part, Thursday evening series on Fulfilling Your Spiritual Needs: A Personal Choice; Living Unique Lives – Jewishly. The participants are being interviewed by Michael Enright, host of CBC's This Morning.

(Last week's guest was Dr. Elliott Malamet, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto faculty member and CJN columnist. The series winds up this week with filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici. Secular humanist practitioner Eva Goldfinger was the second participant.)

Meditation to enhance awareness isn't antithetical to Judaism, although there's a conflict between Judaism and religious Buddhist precepts, Rabbi Lew explained.

He said the Chassidim "used to sit for an hour to incline their consciousness to prepare for the act of prayer," according to the Mishnah. Kabbalah is also a contemplative tradition, he noted.

Zen meditation makes you more aware of yourself, said Rabbi Lew. "What I discovered to my shock was that a tremendous amount of my unconscious material was Jewish."

As a small child, the rabbi lived in Brooklyn, an "intensely Jewish" environment, but moved to a rural area of New York at age six. Judaism became an unimportant part of his life.

As a youngster, he would go into the forest and talk to God, he said. "Nothing I encountered in a synagogue matched these deep, passionate, spiritual feelings that I felt in the forest by myself.

"I wasn't trying to get away from Judaism,...[but] it never occurred to me to pursue those kinds of feelings in a Jewish context."

Rabbi Lew has since realized that Buddhism and traditional Judaism share an element of discipline he feels is important spiritually. But the low percentage of people practising Judaism on a disciplined, daily basis may explain why many are turning elsewhere for spiritual fulfilment, he suggested.

San Francisco is an extreme example. In the Bay Area, the vast majority of people never sets foot in a synagogue, he said. Beth Sholom, Rabbi Lew's congregation, has the only non-Orthodox daily minyan in the area, he told The CJN. Jews are more likely to turn to a therapist, a retreat or an ashram than a rabbi in times of need, he said.

"Unfortunately we've proven to be the wave of the future. Watch for this in your theatre too," he cautioned. "This is a serious disconnect."

He advises concerned parents to "inoculate" their children. "The more you give them of real substance before they go away, the greater the likelihood they'll come back."

His own "inoculation" was minimal, although he recalls his father's father, an Orthodox rabbi, visiting with "three magical satchels of Hebrew letters," he told The CJN in a separate interview. "Now I spend a lot of time meditating on Hebrew letters."

At California's Tassajara Zen Centre where Rabbi Lew studied, there was a group of Jewish students who would joke about being just short of a minyan. Among them was Rabbi Lew's closest friend, a former Orthodox Jew, who "shlepped" him to High Holy Day services every year.

Daily minyan is "the oldest trick in the Jewish spiritual book," Rabbi Lew said. "Davening is...a profound daily spiritual activity."

At Rabbi Lew's synagogue, there is a meditation hour before davening to enhance the experience. Meditation groups exist at most of San Francisco's large Conservative synagogues, Rabbi Lew said.

"Can the path to spirituality be achieved without religion?" asked Enright.

"Sure," said the rabbi. "But religion adds a lot, especially the Jewish religion."

In his mid-30s, after 10 years of studying Buddhism, Rabbi Lew was invited to be ordained as a Buddhist priest. "I couldn't do it."

After leaving Buddhism, he was newly engaged and planning his wedding. "It occurred to us that we're both Jewish – why don't we get a rabbi?" he recalled after the program.

Their rabbi introduced him to Torah study and the rudiments of the Shabbat service, and invited him repeatedly to give divrei Torah at his Santa Rosa congregation.

Then a freelance writer, Rabbi Lew served as "imposter rabbi" after the rabbi returned to his native France, and entered the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1982 at age 37.

"I have great faith in the tenacity of the Jewish spiritual impulse," said Rabbi Lew. "I think it will prevail."

Edgar Bronfman honored on CCCJ 50th anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When it celebrated its 50th anniversary recently, the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews (CCCJ) honored the contributions of its "First Families" – those with two generations of active Council membership.

At the banquet and silent auction held at the Royal York Hotel, Edgar Bronfman, chairman of The Seagram Company Ltd. and president of the World Jewish Congress, was also awarded the CCCJ's Good Servant Medal for his "extraordinary work on behalf of victims of the Holocaust."

The presentation was made by CCCJ president John Bankes, who noted that Bronfman was a member of one of the council's First Families.

"Bronfman speaks to us all of justice — particularly for those who can't speak for themselves," Bankes said.

Bronfman is also president of the World Restitution Organization, which is devoted to ensuring the return of communal Jewish property stolen during the Nazi era in eastern and western Europe.

Ned Goodman, former president of CCCJ and recently appointed chairman of the board, spoke of Bronfman's efforts on behalf of the victims of the Holocaust, and referred to the half-century in which CCCJ "fought to make sure that such history does not repeat itself."

In his acknowledgement of the honor, Bronfman said it wasn't just the Swiss or the French or anybody else, including Canada and the United States, who were responsible for harming Jews.

"The world has not learned its lesson of the Holocaust: anti-Semitism and anti-racism end up with something like the Holocaust," he said.

He noted that hundreds of thousands of people are being murdered in Africa and Asia strictly for racist reasons. "I hope that some day the whole world can learn the lesson of the Holocaust so we can stop the killing of brother against brother."

In the United States, Canada, Britain, France and other countries, he explained, if there is a dormant bank account and nobody claims the money, it belongs to the state.

"In Switzerland, the money belongs to the bank," he said. "So what motivation has the bank to say, 'Sure this isn't ours, this is yours. Take it.'"?

There is now incontrovertible proof, he said, that at least 10 to 15 percent of the gold shipped from Germany to Switzerland contained personal gold from teeth and rings "and we are going to London to make sure this also goes to the survivors."

In addition to caring for the survivors, Bronfman said his dream is to rebuild Judaism, "so that we become worthy of their sacrifice."

Goodman paid tribute to the members of the First Families, saying that they "vowed to create an organization which would work with universality to fight prejudice, injustice, racism and the things which we stand for."

A video presentation featured personal comments from members of the First Families. Those honored included: John and Douglas Bassett; Allan and Edward Bronfman; Sam and Charles Bronfman; Sydney Cooper and Tobie (Cooper) Bekhor; Lady Eaton and John Craig Eaton; Bert and Sheldon Godfrey; Gerald and Peter Godsoe; Ned, Anita and Mark Goodman; Herb and Tanya Philipps; Sam and Dorothy Reitman; Leon Weinstein and Carol (Weinstein) Epstein; and Ray, Rose, and Jonathan Wolfe.

JNF to honor Edward Bronfman

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Edward Bronfman, this year's Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner honoree is a paradox.

As a quiet-spoken man, he shuns the limelight. His commitment to philanthropic causes, however, has brought him numerous honors.

On Dec. 7 at The Sheraton Centre Hotel, the Toronto community will pay tribute to Bronfman "in recognition of excellence in communal leadership and dedication to Israel."

Bronfman has the distinction of being the only Canadian to be chosen as JNF's honoree twice — in Montreal and now in Toronto.

Proceeds from the 49th annual JNF dinner will assist with land reclamation and development at Kibbutz Neot Semadar, established in 1989 in the Southern Arava of the Negev Desert, 70 km north of Eilat, says Tom Ungar, president of JNF Toronto.

"It is an unusual honor and a privilege to be associated with one as committed to worthwhile causes as is Edward Bronfman," says Donald Carr, dinner chair and campaign co-chair with Arnold Cader.

"That is all the more so because of his genuine humility, his concern for the sensitivity towards his fellow human beings, as well as his insistence on fully understanding and being in consonance with the charitable activities which he is asked to support."

Bronfman, said Carr, is "in every sense of the word, a gentleman, and everyone who comes into contact with him senses that immediately.

Edward Bronfman

He is the personification of the ideal candidate for a community's honor and esteem."

Born in Montreal, Bronfman attended Selwyn House and Bishop's College School and received a B.Sc. in business administration from Babson College in Wellesley, Mass. in 1950.

His parents, Allan and Lucy Bronfman were known for their generosity and communal involvement, and Bronfman said that he and his brother Peter, who died last year, could not "help learning to give to those less fortunate."

His eclectic communal involvements include being national co-chair of the Canadian Council for Christians and Jews; board member of the Canadian Council for Aboriginal Business; the Canadian Psychiatric Research Foundation; the Canadian Foundation for AIDS Research; and other health and social service agencies. He serves on the board of governors of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and is an active participant in the JNF and United Jewish Appeal.

In 1989, he established the private Edward Bronfman Family Foundation, dedicated to providing direct services to individuals through project-oriented endeavors.

Foundation head Dayle Rakowsky said it contributed to numerous Canadian, Israeli, and international institutions, whether educational, medical, social services, athletic, artistic or religious.

In an interview at his downtown Toronto office, Bronfman spoke enthusiastically about a recent visit he and his wife Marsha made to Kibbutz Neot Semadar.

He says that he was impressed by the "determination and idealism" of the members of the kibbutz. "We felt they must be typical of the pioneer spirit of the original kibbutz movement. They have created an oasis in the middle of the desert."

He described the farming of traditional crops at the kibbutz — dates, citrus orchards, olive trees, melons, flowers for export and vegetables — and their emphasis on organic agricultural concepts.

"This approach emphasizes [people] living in harmony with their natural surroundings."

Because of the torrid heat most of the year, members of the kibbutz work two shifts, from 5 a.m. to 11 a.m. and then from 5 p.m. to 11 p.m.

Funds raised at the Negev Dinner will help develop the infrastructure at the kibbutz; develop the site as a tourist attraction with an artificial lake that will also serve as a reservoir; create an art studio; and be used for additional land reclamation.

Described by friends as "a proud family man," Bronfman, an avid skier and runner, has three sons, Paul, who is in the entertainment business; David, an entrepreneur; Brian, a mediator in Vermont; and a stepdaughter Lisa, who joined the family when Bronfman married Marsha Noik in 1991.

He says he's pleased that his five grandchildren are Hebrew day school students.

Bronfman, a member of Beth Tzedec Congregation, says that although he prefers to "remain inconspicuous," he agreed to accept JNF's tribute "because this is an opportunity for me to help further the wonderful work done by JNF and to raise funds for this outstanding project.

"If I hadn't accepted, I would have missed the opportunity to meet the dedicated people at Kibbutz Neot Semadar."

The recently appointed Jerusalem emissary to Toronto from JNF world headquarters, Col. Yaen Vered, will participate in the program. Vered has been appointed for a three year term.

Ben Prossin, executive director of JNF Toronto says, "Edward Bronfman is perhaps the best example of a person who has not chased honors but whom honor has sought."

CAMPAIGN COUNTDOWN BEGINS

Days of Decision

Your Time To Make A Difference.
December 7th-17th, 1997

Toronto's Jewish community is being asked to help propel UJA Federation's Campaign '98 toward one of its best years yet as it approaches the official closing on December 17.

The Days of Decision, from December 7 –17, will marshal hundreds of volunteers to raise as much money as possible before the campaign ends. They'll be contacting more than 4,000 UJA Federation supporters who have not yet made their 1998 pledge. To date, 23,000 donors have contributed over $30 million.

Even though UJA Federation continues to accept gifts after December 17, budget deliberations for beneficiary agencies begin in January. Days of Decision co-chairs Judy Engel and Colin Lewis point out that Jews in need count on UJA Federation's year-round support.

Days of Decision telethons will be held at UJA Federation headquarters, 4600 Bathurst St., as well as other locations around the city, including homes, offices and agencies. "This is an opportunity for volunteers who could not attend previous telethons to pitch in", explains Engel.

UJA Federation is also inviting children to experience the campaign excitement. On Sunday December 7, Junior UJA is organizing games and entertainment at the Lipa Green Building, to keep kids busy, while their parents are on the phone.

If you would like to help make calls on behalf of Jews in need all over the world please call (416) 631-5699.

Golden Praises Partnership

The United Way of Greater Toronto will be allocating $3 million this year to Jewish agencies, maintaining a strong partnership with the community.

The United Way provides funding for 10 organizations including the Bathurst Jewish Centre, Jewish Family and Child Service and Senior Care – all UJA Federation beneficiary agencies – plus the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, in addition to UJA Federation support.

United Way President Anne Golden says the historically close relationship between Toronto's Jewish community and the United Way is mutually beneficial. "The United Way allocates more than 10% of our annual budget to Jewish agencies," explains Golden, "but in return Jewish leadership plays an important role in our organization."

During the early 1940s, the United Jewish Welfare Fund, UJA Federation's predecessor played an integral role in founding the United Way by providing expertise, staff and volunteers. "There would not be a United Way without the Jewish community," emphasizes Dr. Stephen Speisman, Director of the Ontario Jewish Archives.

Each year members of the Jewish community participate in the United Way Walk-A-thon.

Jewish Family and Child Service is the largest community recipient of United Way funding at almost $1.4 million a year for administrative costs and salaries.

Golden called Jewish Vocational Service, which provides a wide range of educational, employment and vocational training for both Jews and non-Jews, a "cutting edge organization."

Golden is "impressed" with the "innovative and creative programs" run by many of the Jewish agencies funded by the United Way.

That's one of the reasons why she believes "the partnership between the United Way and the Jewish community will continue as long as people need help."

Going the Extra Mile

Children with special needs and teenagers searching for their Jewish identity will be the beneficiaries of "plus giving" by UJA Federation supporters.

In addition to their annual campaign commitment, members of the Investment Division have undertaken to help fund a school for physically and developmentally challenged children. The Builders and Developers Division is supporting a program that takes high school students on a journey through post-World War II Jewish history.

The Investment Division, chaired by Harvey Naglie and Norman Levine, has already raised more than $85,000 for the Zareinu School which educates children with special needs. Proceeds from the Zareinu Fund will provide the school with resources to help subsidize the school's tuition - approximately $11,000 per child - and to help meet growing demands on facilities and programming.

"It's difficult to weigh the relative value of mitzvahs," suggests Naglie, "but what they're doing at Zareinu puts them on the very highest plain." Naglie says he and others were deeply moved by the presentation made to the Investment Division by Zareinu staff on behalf of the school. "It's an honour for us to be associated with them and to help meet their needs."

The Builders and Developers Division, chaired by Stephen Goldhar and David Peltz, chose the March of Living program as their special project, for which they have raised close to $60,000 dollars so far. Every two years, hundreds of teenagers from across Canada join thousands of their counterparts on an emotional tour of concentration camps and Jewish sites in Poland and in Israel.

Peter Ekstein, co-chair of the Construction Cabinet and a child of a Holocaust survivor, says the division chose March of the Living to make the mission more accessible to Jewish youth. "Hopefully the money we raise will help narrow the gap between what people can afford and the actual cost of the trip," says Ekstein. Last year more than 300 Toronto area high school students participated in the March.

MISSION TRACES HISTORY

Hundreds of Canadians will relive some of the most decisive and dramatic events in Israel's history on UJA Federation's historic trip celebrating the Jewish homeland's 50th anniversary.

Mission 98 Israel at 50, February 23 – March 4, 1998 features first class accommodations, daily breakfasts, most other meals, all touring and entrance fees, and, according to Mission 98 Chair Sandra Brown, "a chance to see Israel the way only UJA Federation can show it."

In addition to visiting Israel's most popular sites – the kotel (Western Wall), Masada, and picturesque Lake Kinneret, Mission 98 participants will tour landmarks of Israel's heritage, such as Tel Chai, Ein Shemer and Acco where illegal Jewish immigrants and Jewish resistance fighters were held by the British, during the War of Independence. The fortress at Acco houses a museum commemorating the release of 41 Jews from prison by Israeli forces.

In marking Israel's 50th anniversary, participants will follow the courageous footsteps of Jewish fighters on the "Warriors Tour", climb through the Golan Heights and attend festive celebrations across the country. A gala Israel at 50 anniversary dinner will be held for the entire Canadian contingent at the Jerusalem Conference Centre.

"This is a once in a lifetime chance for our community to show our solidarity with Israel and to take part in one of the most pivotal events in modern Jewish history," says Brown. "If you've ever thought of going to Israel...this is the time."

So far, some 300 Torontonians have either reserved space or expressed their intentions to participate. For more information on Mission 98 call (416) 635-2883 ext. 308.

PERSON TO PERSON

UJA Federation's Friend for Life

Motivational expert Jonathan Miller's infectious enthusiasm and inspirational power have been generating excitement around UJA Federation campaigns for years. But the veteran volunteer says what he's gotten back from all his hard work is just as valuable as what he's given.

Miller, who is president of his own motivation, sales and marketing company, realized he had a talent for inspiring others at an early age while growing up in Manchester, England. His commitment to tzedakah began at about the same time when Miller and a group of his teenage friends raised funds to help homeless Jews.

After coming to Canada for an extended visit with his brother in 1969, Miller decided to make Toronto his home and began selling women's dresses throughout the Windsor - Toronto corridor from the back of a truck. Miller's sales strength eventually led to ownership of a 13 store chain, which he sold in 1977.

Although he had been a UJA Federation supporter for many years, serving as co-chair of the Fashion and Textile Division, it wasn't until the 1992 campaign that Miller's unique motivational skills changed the way campaigners were being trained.

"Training was the poor cousin of campaign," explains Miller, who later became UJA Federation's senior trainer. "I believe campaign training should be an event in itself."

Miller, who always feels comfortable in front of a crowd, believes straight talk is the best strategy. "Look them in the eye and tell them what you want," he says. "That way you remove the tension from the conversation and the negotiation."

Today, even though his consulting takes him to Jewish organizations all over the world, including the U.S., Britain and Israel, Miller is always on hand to energize and encourage UJA Federation volunteers. "UJA Federation," he proclaims, "has a devotee for life."

IN

There is nothing more heartwarming than bringing a smile to the face of a child. But, for many in our community, smiles are sometimes few and far between. Through the Junior UJA Tzedakah All-Star Team, a program initiated by UJA Federation, hundreds of children can smile more often.

A PROGRAM LIKE NO OTHER

The program, founded by Toronto mom Elizabeth Erlich two years ago, is a means for young children to donate birthday and holiday presents to needy youngsters. A Tzedakah All Star box in which children are encouraged to deposit unwrapped gifts is located in several Jewish day schools throughout the city.

To date, close to 2,000 gifts have been sent to Jewish Family & Child Service for distribution. "It's an excellent way to teach young children the principles of giving in a fun and easy to understand format," says Tzedakah All-Star Team past chairperson Karen Amato. "The support from the young kids has been incredible. They really have learned the meaning of sharing."

FROM EAR TO EAR

"The children who benefit from this project have so little – they beam with delight when they receive a new toy on Chanukah or their birthdays," remarks Jewish Family & Child Service spokesperson Florence Weinberger.

And the satisfaction gained from the presents stretches far beyond the recipients. Each child who donates a gift receives a note of appreciation from the Tzedakah All-Star Team and also becomes a member of the Junior UJA Club which entitles them to participate in special events throughout the year.

For Jacob Druck, 10, and his sister Jamie, 12, giving to others less fortunate is an important part of their lives. "There are lots of parents who are not able to give their children toys because they don't have the money," says Jamie. "It makes me feel good to know that I can bring happiness to somebody else."

"I've already donated games – and I'm going to continue giving," promises Jacob.

The Tzedakah All Star Team, is another example of UJA Federation funding in action.

FUND FURTHERS JEWISH EDUCATION

The largest endowment fund created solely for Jewish education in Toronto is helping one of the world's most respected Jewish education systems become even better.

The Wagman Fund, administered by UJA Federation, was created in 1990 through the generosity of the late Toronto businessman Saul Wagman, to enhance the quality of Jewish education and access to it.

Since its establishment, the Wagman Fund has been used for teacher training through conference subsidies; the purchase of curriculum material and audio visual equipment; and the hiring of a consultant for children with special needs.

The most recent initiative made possible through the fund was the Board of Jewish Education's Professional Development Day, held earlier this month. Approximately 1300 day and supplementary school teachers attended the two day conference, devoted to Israel at 50. It focused on providing educators with tools and techniques to help them incorporate Israel into the classroom. Keynote speaker Dr. Avraham Infeld, Founder and President of the Melitz Centres for Jewish Zionist Education in Jerusalem, told teachers to "explore Israel's complexities" in order to "make it come alive in your teachings."

"The Wagman Fund gives us the opportunity to implement initiatives and programs we would not otherwise have the resources to do," notes UJA Federation President Joey Steiner.

"The most important role of the BJE is to develop the skills and talents of our educators," adds BJE Chair Shirley Worth. "High quality teachers and curriculum will result in high quality students and a bright future."

Volunteer Views

Volunteer Views highlights dedicated volunteers and volunteering opportunities in our community.

Just a little time

Richard Eichler believes when it comes to tzedakah, time is just as important as money. That's why, in addition to supporting UJA Federation and several other community charities, the 35 year old consultant volunteers as a big brother.

Eichler has been a Jewish Family and Child Service big brother to a ten year old boy, who has grown up without a father, for almost a year and half. Being a positive male influence in his young friend's life makes Eichler feel like he's making a difference.

A good listener

"I know how important it can be for him to have a man to talk to sometimes," explains Eichler. "With me, he can talk openly and comfortably about certain things in his daily life."

The two, who meet once a week, except when Eichler's work takes him out of town, usually go to a sporting event, a movie or some kind of show.

"He really loved Joseph and the Amazing Technicolour Dream Coat," recalls Eichler. "After the show, he was grinning from ear to ear and I was glad I could do that for him."

Jewish values

Although the Calgary native is also involved with State of Israel Bonds and Beit Halochem, Eichler says his role as a big brother is something very special and unique.

"It's a natural way for me to express my Jewishness and to give something of myself back to the community."

If you are interested in applying to be a big brother call Jewish Family and Child Service, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency at (416) 638-7800.

Your Time To Make A Difference.

December 7th-17th, 1997

TEN DAYS. TENS OF THOUSANDS IN NEED.

It takes only a minute to improve a life forever. One minute to make a commitment to UJA Federation and hundreds helped by your gift alone.

Our community's response to Campaign 98 has been extraordinary. UJA Federation's Campaign Management Team extends its gratitude to more than 23,000 contributors who have donated over $30 million so far.

But we still have enormous commitments to honour. To the poor, the ill and the elderly. To Jews in danger around the world. To Jewish education. To Jewish values.

If you have not yet joined UJA Federation's family of supporters this year, please do so during the upcoming Days of Decision, December 7-17. Your gift is more than a matter of money. It's an umbrella of hope for thousands of people around the world.

NEW BEGINNINGS

Elana (a pseudonym is being used by request) is studying philosophy at university with her eye on a criminology career, thanks to Jewish Family & Child Service, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency. Before finding JF&CS, Elana, a single mother with three children, was desperate for financial and moral support. This summer, UJA Federation and JF&CS helped her two sons experience camp for the first time.

STARTING OVER

When Irene Lastman suffered a stroke over a decade ago, she converted all her energy into getting better through the Stroke Recovery Group at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, a UJA beneficiary agency. In July, nearly 100 people participated in a yearly dinner for group members and their spouses.

BEYOND ETHIOPIA

Fourteen years ago, Shlomo Molla, at the age of 16, literally walked into a new life. It was a dangerous 700 kilometre hike from Ethiopia to Sudan, for a flight to Israel, funded by the UJA Federation supported Jewish Agency. Today, Molla supervises Hebrew instruction for immigrants in Israel's north.

Entebbe pilot recalls mission for museum fundraiser

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joshua Shani insists he was just "in the right place at the right time."

After a suggestion he's being too modest, Shani pauses. "I was the squadron commander," he allows. "Not to have been chosen would have been the end of a career."

Not only did his career not end, but it took off, and flew straight into the history books.

Shani was chosen to fly the lead plane in Israel's audacious 1976 raid on the Entebbe airport in Uganda, which resulted in the rescue of over 100 hostages, most of them Israelis.

It was a singular event in modern Israeli history, and it's something that will never leave Shani, now 52.

"It's something that is still very significant in Israel," the retired air force general told The CJN. "And I will never forget it. It's still very vivid."

Shani was in Toronto last week for a fundraiser for the Israel Air Force Museum, which exhibits one of the planes flown in the daring mission that captured the imagination of the world.

Shani recalls he was briefed about the secret operation a scant few hours before it began.

"I then had just 20 minutes to tell my squadron. They had a million questions. I told them we had to solve problems as they happened in real time."

Shani piloted the lead C-130 transport craft, one of three that appeared, guns blazing, over Entebbe at dawn on July 4, 1976. After a lightning strike, Israeli commandoes freed 103 hostages who had been held by Arab extremists for over a week.

Killed in the 15-minute firefight were three Israeli hostages and the commander of the rescue force, Yonatan Netanyahu, the older brother of Israel's prime minister.

All the hijackers and about 20 Ugandan troops were killed.

Shani's plane carried back some of those rescued. "I saw their faces …children, women, old people. It all happened so fast, they didn't understand. I can still see those faces."

Although retired, Shani is still in the air force reserves. "Israel is the only place in the world where you can be retired and reserved," he quipped.

Last week's gala at the Royal Ontario Museum raised $60,000 for the museum, located at the Hatzerim Air Force Base in the Negev. Also in attendance was Brig.-Gen. Ya'akov Terner, commander of the museum.

Jewish 'newspaper' targets local businesses

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some local businesses are being targeted with high-pressure tactics employed by a York Region outfit that claims to publish a Jewish newspaper.

In recent weeks, local companies have received invoices warning they owe money for ads supposedly taken out in the paper.

The invoices threaten legal action unless the amount is paid within five days. Two of the bills obtained by The CJN say the company owes $495 for ads in the publication's "Holiday Edition – Jewish New Year."

Companies that received the threatening letters include generic drug giant Apotex Inc. and Pindoff Record Sales, which supplies retail music outlets.

Victor Goldman of Pindoff Record Sales told The CJN he was angry at the hotly-worded invoice. He said the ad in question was never authorized. He called the phone number listed and said he wouldn't pay.

Goldman then passed on the information to Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, which requested back issues.

Chrysler Canada approved an ad that cost more than $5,000, without checking the paper out.

But the agency that handles Chrysler's advertising, BBDO Canada, says it has requested a tear sheet of the ad, a third-party audited statement of the paper's circulation and several back issues before it pays.

Robert Cohn, chair of the ethics committee of the American Jewish Press Association (of which The CJN is a member), says operations like this are commonplace.

Cohn says unknown Jewish newspapers pop up all the time across North America and send out aggressively-worded invoices to unsuspecting businesses, especially large ones that might blindly pay them. Even a small return keeps the "boiler-room" operation in business.

Cohn, who publishes the St. Louis Jewish Light, says established Jewish newspapers should alert their advertisers to dubious ad solicitations; to have them turn over anything they receive in writing from such publications, especially invoices; and implore them never to pay an unknown invoice.

If unsure, an advertiser should demand to see a signed authorization for the ad and at least three back issues of the publication, Cohn added.

The invoices from the newspaper list an address and phone number in Vaughan.

The company's general manager told The CJN his paper is a monthly, put out by a Toronto-based publisher.

He promised to send The CJN a copy of his Rosh Hashanah issue, and said any further questions should be put in writing.

After questions were submitted in writing, he accused The CJN of "harassment," and being "afraid of competition."

He said ads in the paper were "verbally approved," and that his lawyer is taking all arrears accounts to court.

He said "the biggest companies in the world" advertise in the paper.

In 1993, the Bank of Nova Scotia alerted The CJN to a letter it received from a phantom Jewish newspaper in Los Angeles.

The letter threatened legal action unless the bank paid a $3,600 bill for an ad, which the bank denied taking out.

According to the bank at the time, the letter came from the same person who runs the Vaughan operation.

Cantorial concert to combine two traditions

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A cantorial concert scheduled for this Sunday, entitled East Meets West, will feature cantorial selections from both the Ashkenazi and Sephardi traditions.

The concert will be held at the Sephardic Kehila Centre at Bathurst and Steeles, on Nov. 30 at 7:30 p.m.

But the Toronto Council of Hazzanim, which is presenting the event, does more than showcase the two great ethnic traditions of the Jewish people. It is one of the very few organizations to which professionals working for Orthodox, Conservative and Reform congregations all belong.

The council was formed in the early 1960s, by Cantor Nathan Stolnitz, who held positions in several Toronto congregations.

Past president Eliezer Kirshblum, chazzan of Adath Israel Congregation, said that the council should represent something very special to the Jewish community.

"The common denominator is that we are all Jews, and that we are all cantors. We put aside our differences. Out of respect for our professionalism, we sit legitimately with Orthodox, Conservative and Reform, Ashkenazi and Sephardi."

"Music transcends all boundaries," added current president Efraim Sapir, cantor of Beth Tikvah Synagogue. "[The council] represents what the Jewish world should get to in the messianic era."

The Toronto Council of Hazzanim has monthly meetings that deal with such matters as organizing concerts, chazzanut, voice care, what is new in Jewish music, allocation of funds, communal issues and professional development.

One of the most important aspects of the council is the Toronto Cantorial Trust Fund, of which Kirshblum is the chair. In the 25 years it has been operating, Kirshblum said, it has raised over half a million dollars for the Toronto Jewish community and for special causes in Israel.

An annual allocation is donated to the three cantorial training schools, the Cantorial Council of America (Orthodox), the Cantors Assembly (Conservative) and the (Reform) American Conference of Cantors.

As well, scholarships are granted to students studying for the cantorate or involved with Jewish music.

East Meets West will feature guest cantors Shlomo Amzalag of Montreal (affectionally known as Samy Elmohgribi – Samy the North African, explained Sapir) and Aaron Bensoussan from New York City, as well as Toronto cantors David Bagley, Paul Kowarsky, Yaacov Motzen and Armand Moyal.

Sapir and Kirshblum said that the Toronto cantorate is unique, partly because most chazzanim also do pastoral work, but mostly because of its vibrancy and cohesiveness. Much of this is due to the efforts of Kirshblum, Sapir said, calling his by-then blushing colleague "our compass and our anchor."

O.J.'s lawyer addresses UJA

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The polarization of blacks and whites in the United States following the sensational O.J. Simpson murder trial was caused mainly by the lawyers involved, Simpson's lead defence lawyer said here earlier this month.

"What was it that caused such hatred and division? A lot of the fault is due to the lawyers and their presentations," Robert Shapiro told a United Jewish Appeal program at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

The race issue played in the trial — pitting a black defendant and a mainly black jury against a legal system perceived as being run by whites — "was started by the lawyers," the high-profile Shapiro told a packed house of lawyers, accountants and businesspeople.

Although Shapiro didn't name him, he strongly implied it was his defence colleague Johnny Cochrane who played the race card "from the bottom of the deck."

It was also Cochrane, Shapiro recalled, who compared Los Angeles police detective and trial witness Mark Fuhrman to Adolf Hitler, and it was Cochrane who cozied up to the militant Nation of Islam.

Shapiro hinted at his disdain for his colleague by saying, "Johnny Cochrane wanted to be here tonight, but this room isn't big enough for his ego."

Although he got plenty of anti-Semitic hate mail and his family received death threats, Shapiro said the Simpson trial "changed my life forever and certainly, for the better."

He said the trial's outcome "might have been different" had Simpson testified in his own defence.

Shapiro said he tried on the bloody glove Simpson was alleged to have worn on the night of the murders, and knew it wouldn't fit his client. "I told him to carry it like the Olympic torch. I told him to pull and tug on it" before the jury, he said.

"If you had heard the testimony the way the jury heard it, whether you liked it or not, your legal responsibility would be that there was reasonable doubt," Shapiro said.

WINNIPEG — A statement published in the Oct. 27 issue of the Jewish Post and News by the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's (WJCC) Multiple Appeals Commission (MAC) has stirred up a hornets' nest of controversy.

The paid ad slams all of the city's major synagogues and their rabbis for violating MAC's long established guidelines for fundraising within the Jewish community.

The Multiple Appeals Commission was created 10 years ago to bring order to Jewish fundraising activities in the city. Its guidelines stipulate that any organization mounting a campaign that will bring in more than $10,000 has to clear it with MAC. As well, most organizations are allowed to have a major fundraiser only every second year, the exceptions being the annual Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner and YMHA JCC Sports Dinner.

Individual synagogues are also allowed to have one fundraising dinner a year. The beginning of September until the middle of October is reserved for the annual Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign. The only exceptions are the traditional JNF and Israel Bond Yom Kippur appeals in the synagogues.

For many years, some of the synagogues have also been conducting their own internal appeals for donations on Yom Kippur as well. It seems to have become an issue this year because the financially-strapped Rosh Pina Congregation – the city' second largest synagogue – decided to follow suit.

In his broadside, Dr. Michael Helper, MAC's chair, publically admonished the Rosh Pina, Beth Israel, B'nay Abraham, Herzlia and Shaarey Zedek synagogues for violating the MAC moratorium.

"The Shaarey Zedek [Winnipeg's largest congregation] didn't fund raise," Helper notes, "but it did conduct a feasibility study into a future capital campaign. That goes against the spirit of the moratorium."

Helper says that on becoming aware of the Rosh Pina's plans, he sent letters to all the synagogues before Yom Tov warning them against conducting internal campaigns in violation of the moratorium.

Rabbi Akiva Lubow of the Rosh Pina responded, on behalf of the Winnipeg Council of Rabbis, to Helper's finger-pointing with a letter to the editor that was printed in the Jewish Post on Nov. 12. Rabbi Lubow noted that the rabbis and congregational leaders have been meeting with WJCC representatives for the last two years about the issue of High Holy Days appeals.

The WJCC wanted to have an appeal for the CJA campaign included with Israel Bonds and the JNF appeals. The synagogues wanted to also include their own pitches for funding. Rabbi Lubow reported that an agreement had been reached to accommodate both sides at a meeting a few months ago.

"During and after that meeting, it came to my attention that three synagogues have conducted High Holy Days appeals in the past with no repercussions," he wrote. "The only difference between previous years and this year, and what would appear to be the only reason that MAC has this year taken any action, is that a fourth synagogue, Rosh Pina, also conducted an appeal," he charged.

Rather than protecting the primacy of the CJA campaign, he wrote, MAC should be concerned about protecting the primacy and recognizing the importance of every vital Jewish institution in the community.

"If ours is a community which needlessly chooses to pit the needs of the CJA against the needs of the synagogues, ours is a Jewish community without a future," he observed. "With one synagogue after another facing financial crisis and struggling to keep its doors open, where will Israel Bonds, the JNF and the CJA campaigns be conducted after all the synagogues have closed? Without the synagogue, where is the teaching to take place, where are the religious services to be held and where is the Jew to turn for spiritual fulfilment and to have his or her religious needs met?

"My biggest problem with the whole MAC approach is the notion that they have any right, whatsoever, to try to dictate to the synagogues when they may and may not conduct internal synagogue fundraising of any type."

David Bloomfield, president of the Beth Israel Synagogue, reports that his synagogue has been appealing for funds on Yom Tov for years. He also supports Rabbi Lubow in pointing out that the synagogue boards, not the rabbis, make the decisions about fundraising.

"The prime responsibility of any congregational rabbi is to serve the needs of the synagogue's members," Rabbi Lubow wrote.

"Just Between Us"

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן

אמבר:

אתם לא היכרתם את אמבר. מידי יום חמישי בהיותה בבית החולים, היתה באה להצגת "יזנגות". היא נאבקה בסרטן כמו אדם מבוגר למרות שש שנותיה. בהרבה מן הפעמים היא היתה באה עם ילד קטן ונכה שגם הוא אושפז פעמים אין ספור, ודואגת לו, ופעם אפילו קנתה לו את קלטת שירי ההצגה. לפני שישה חדשים הגיעה ראשונה לפני כל שאר הילדים והוריהם ובעיניים זוהרות אמרה לנו שמחר הוא יום ההולדת שלה. תוך כדי הצגה הצלחנו לארגן לה מתנה, לעטוף אותה להעלות אותה לבמה בסוף ולהפתיע אותה עד דמעות. אבל היו אלה דמעות של אושר. השבוע סיפרו לנו שאמבר נפטרה. השתלת מוח העצם שלה נכשלה, ומלחמתה הגיעה לקיצה. ואנחנו בתוך הדמעות חשבנו כמה למדנו מימך אמבר איך ליהנות ממה שיש, ולא להתלונן על מה שאין. תודה אמבר, שנתת לנו לחגוג לך את יום הולדתך האחרון. היי שלום, אמבר, נוחי על משכבך בשלווה, ואמרי שם שלום לבן, מוישה ושאר הילדים שישבו על הכיסאות הקטנים בתיאטרון שלנו והלכו. אתם המלאכים שלנו, אתם טעם החיים. אנחנו נעשה כל שבידינו למצוא מרפא למחלות שלכם.

הקצין שנכשל במבדקי הקצונה:

קראתי בעיתון ראיון מרתק עם סגן הרמטכ"ל החדש, שאול מופז. עולה מהראיון שמשפחתו התיישבה מאילת בתנאים קשים והוא מצא את עצמו בפנימיה בנהלל עם כל המי ומי של ההתיישבות העובדת. ובעוד הם היו יוצאים לחופשות שבת, הוא היה, במקום לנסוע לאילת, עובד וחוסך כסף ברפתות של המשפחות של חבריו בנהלל. אבל זה לא הקטע שלכד את דמיוני אלא דווקא העובדה ששאול מופז, בהיותו צנחן, ניסה שלוש פעמים להתקבל לקורס קצינים ונכשל במבדקים. הוא התקבל בסופו של דבר משום שבשנת 1969, בהיותו מ"כ של כיתה ששכבה במארבים, הוא המציא סוג של מארב שהצליח יותר מהמארב שהיה מקובל עד אז, ושנקרא עד היום "מארב מופז". בעקבות המקרה הזה החליט מח"ט הצנחנים לשלוח אותו לקורס קצינים ללא מבדקים, והשאר הסטוריה. מופז הינו אחד הקצינים המבריקים, הזהירים והאחראיים ביותר שהיו לישראל. כולנו מכירים אנשים שהיו תלמידים בינוניים, וש"בחיים" הפכו להצלחה גדולה. היו לי מספר סטודנטים שבגלל הציונים שלהם לא הסכימו לקבל אותם למאסטר או דוקטורט, ומהעבודה איתם היה לי ברור שהם מצוינים. אז מה עושים? אסור לוותר. לרבים מאיתנו יש ילדים בגילאים של סוף תיכון- אוניברסיטה. אסור לוותר! לנסות שוב ושוב, כי חבל לוותר על קריירה שלמה רבת שנים בגלל בחינות כניסה. בסופו של דבר - האדם הרבה יותר מאושר כשהוא עושה מה שהוא באמת רוצה לעשות. אבל שיישאר בינינו.

מברוק לשמעון זר אביב :

מזה עשר שנים, ללא הפסקה, פותחים אלפי ישראלים את מכשירי הרדיו ביום ראשון בתדר 105.5 FM ב- 10 בבוקר לשעתיים שמחברות אותם לחוויה הישראלית, למה שקורה בארץ, ואולי יותר חשוב - למה שקורה בקהילה כאן. וכל זה קורה בגלל מסירותה של קבוצה קטנה מאוד של אנשים, ובראשם שמעון זר אביב. אני לא יכול לחשוב על שום אדם אחר שעשה כל כך הרבה להפוך אותנו לקהילה, להביא אותנו יחד, וכל זאת שלא על מנת לקבל תשלום או פרס כלשהוא. כל מכריו מוקיריו של שמעון יודעים שאם קורית צרה, קטנה או גדולה, אם צריך לעזור למשפחה נזקקת או לילד שזקוק לאשפוז- שמעון יעשה הכל כדי לעזור. תמיד בטוב לב, באהבת האדם, תמיד בלי להגיד מילה רעה על איש. אחרי עשר שנים רצופות של שידור, זה הזמן המתאים להודות לשמעון, לורה ולאלה שעזרו, ולהגיד להם שלולא מאמציהם לא היתה כנראה "קהילה ישראלית" אלה רק קבוצה של אנשים שהגיעה מן המזרח התיכון.

Jewish women face sexism, anti-Semitism, says author

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The extent to which Canadian Jewish women experience anti-Semitism and sexism is shocking, says an author and associate professor of social work at McMaster University.

After interviewing a number of women on the subject, Nora Gold said she came away distraught and angry.

Gold, a contributor to the book Celebrating the Lives of Jewish Women: Patterns in a Feminist Sampler, (Harrington Park Press), edited by Rachel Josefowitz Siegel and Ellen Cole, spoke at the Jewish Book Fair. Also on the panel were contributors Sarah Taieb-Carlen, a professor at York University, and Rachel Schlesinger, associate professor at York University.

Gold, who interviewed women from a wide range of backgrounds, from ages 22 to 77, said she was not prepared for what she was told.

"One women was asked if she had eaten a non-Jewish baby. Another reported that a noose had been hung from her tree, and one woman said she was called a Jewish princess by her colleague. The women found these things shocking, horrifying and frightening," she said.

Important to note, said Gold, is that when these events were recounted to non-Jewish friends, they were trivialized. "That was a kind of second intimidation."

'Incredibly sad stories'

Most people reported that they felt most comfortable among their own, Gold said. "Feminists said they were most comfortable with feminists, but not non-Jewish feminists. This reduction of safe space is directly related to the oppression of women."

A lot of "incredibly sad stories" were told about sexism, Gold said.

"I was given a lot of examples of sexism at home and at work, where they felt they always had to prove themselves. They also talked about sexism in the Jewish community and mentioned Judaism as being a boys' club. They felt betrayed and put down because many Jewish men desire a gentile girlfriend."

Some women feel their bodies are "too Jewish" – big hips, large nose, frizzy hair – said Gold. "These women have been brought up to reject their bodies."

Schlesinger, who interviewed a number of immigrant grandmothers, said these women can transmit to their grandchildren what it was like to live in worlds that have disappeared.

"Many were upset about materialism. In their backgrounds, the Jewish community had been important, but here, they found that individualism is more important."

One grandmother, she said, worried that too little time was spent in the kitchen "because that is when the oral tradition was spread – when cooking and washing dishes. The oral tradition has now spread to the car," said Schlesinger.

Another grandmother, from Latvia, told Schlesinger that when she came to Canada, she found it difficult to light Shabbat candles in the open, because she stilled feared persecution.

Advocate for the disabled offers parents practical advice

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Mark Nagler was diagnosed with cerebral palsy at age five, his parents were advised to put him in an institution.

Instead, they determined that he would have all the opportunities that they could get for him. And their efforts paid off, noted the author of 12 books, the possessor of a PhD and a professor at the University of Waterloo.

"If they had institutionalized me, I would have been dead," he declared.

Nagler spoke at the Jewish Book Fair about his recent book Yes You Can; a guide to parents of children with disabilities (Stoddart, 1997).

"Everyone has the potential to reach his maximum. And many surpass what others say is your maximum," Nagler said.

All parents, he said, dream of having a child who is a PhD or an Olympic medalist, but most of them are happy with a child who is just normal. Having a child who is "different," Nagler said, is very hard.

His parents became advocates for him. When the school board refused to admit him, "in 1945, they had 95 people picketing the school board," until they let him in.

Complain when mistreated

They insisted that the school provide assistance that he needed, and made sure that he was able to take exams orally, since he was never able to learn to write.

Parents must enlist the aid of those who can help, such as health professionals, and organizations that provide financial and other assistance, he said.

He urged that people listen carefully to disabled children when they complain of being mistreated.

"People have the attitude 'who would do anything to someone who is disabled.' In fact, they are more likely to be abused physically, sexually and politically. It is a tragic reality."

Nagler is adamant that children be integrated into the regular system wherever possible, using teachers' aides or special equipment, or training teachers to give prescriptions or injections if necessary.

It is also important, he said, to "train, educate and support your child to [deal with] the fact that sooner or later they will have to move out [of the parental home]."

You must maintain the dignity of the disabled, he said, including insisting that they have the right to ask for what they need, even if they have to ask three or four times.

Parents can burn out dealing with a disabled child, Nagler said, citing the Robert Latimer case as an example. "You have to organize yourself and associate yourself with support groups. Other parents can suggest strategies, and provide support and help."

Nagler gave a list of 12 criteria for parents dealing with a disabled child. Some of them were to not be surprised by trouble; look for partial improvements; heighten your powers of appreciation; be innovative and imaginative; and accept what can't be changed.

WLU unites students for Rabin memorial lecture

By HEATH APPLEBAUM
Special to the CJN

WATERLOO — Almost 100 students and faculty from Wilfred Laurier University (WLU), University of Waterloo, University of Guelph and University of Western Ontario gathered last week for the second annual Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Lecture.

The memorial signifies a unifying force in the Jewish community.

Analysis

It represents the only annual event in the city that brings students from local universities, as well as local synagogue members, together for a common cause.

"It was an opportunity for us to do something very important together, to help build and strengthen the local Jewish community" said Beth Suraski, co-president of the Jewish Students Association (JSA).

The evening included a film documenting the events that have shaped the State of Israel, and Yitzhak Rabin's legacy to pursue peace in the Middle East; a candle-lighting ceremony in which Rabbi Nathan Langer from Kitchener's Orthodox Beth Jacob Congregation and Barb Sivak from Waterloo's Temple Shalom, lit yahrtzeit candles; a political analysis of Rabin's role in furthering the peace process, given by Prof. David Goldberg of the Foundation for Middle East Studies; and a synopsis of the modern Zionist movement as Israel approaches 50 years, given by Eli Rubenstein of the United Israel Appeal.

The event was a tremendous success for Laurier, said Rimma Barinshteyn, an executive member of the JSA. "It's reassuring to the Jewish students here that the community does support our work and our goal to strengthen the Jewish presence on campus."

Until 1993 there had never been an organized Jewish group at Laurier. The group's focus was clear from the outset — to create a pluralistic and non-denominational Jewish group on campus that would bring students together to express whatever connection to Judaism they had, whether by eating bagels, watching Woody Allen videos, organizing social events or leading Holocaust education and interfaith dialogue on campus.

This open-minded approach has served Laurier well in welcoming new students to get involved each year, creating a casual atmosphere where Jewish students can meet and just hang out.

In just four years, WLU has established a thriving Jewish student group that now serves over 100 students on campus, and coordinates events with the University of Waterloo's student group.

Sharing ideas and resources, and having a combined student population of approximately 300 students, has improved the quality of Jewish campus life in the city.

Laurier is also actively involved with Canadian Jewish Congress events. It hosted last year's conference of presidents of Ontario Jewish campus groups and participated in this year's Jewish Life on Campus session in Toronto, which allows graduating high schhool students to meet with Jewish leaders from Ontario universities and ask questions about campus life and specific academic programs.

While recognizing the success of Jewish life at Laurier in recent years, many obstacles and challenges remain for small university Jewish groups, who must cope with shrinking budgets, student apathy and the need to find new campus leaders each year.

At a provincial level, these small campuses are now benefiting from the emergence of Kol Hastudentim – The Ontario Jewish Student Voice.

Kol Hastudentim is an independent, student-organized and run council which collectively represents the Ontario campus communities through the involvement of 18 elected campus presidents.

The council has taken on the role of strengthening Jewish leadership development, coordinating province-wide programming, and promoting an inter-campus communication and resource link.

The remarkable story of perseverance on Laurier campus is that it has managed to nearly triple active membership, and organize dozens of cultural and educational events, despite the collapse of all university funding and an annual allocation of only $1,600 provided by the Council of Jewish Federations for programming on campus.

Subsequently, the JSA is seeking alternative sources of funding to continue its important community work, and while no private sponsors have stepped forward to support its cause, financial support was provided by the two local synagogues for this year's Rabin Memorial.

Ian Lubek, JSA treasurer said, "This could not have been made possible without the generous support of both Beth Jacob and Temple Shalom congregations, a clear sign that we must work together to achieve common goals."

Laurier looks forward to developing a closer link between students and the community on more joint projects such as the Rabin Memorial.

This is proof enough that Jewish continuity is alive and well today, not only in small communities, but on university campuses across Ontario where students represent the leaders of tomorrow.

Heath Applebaum, a WLU student, was founding president of the school's Jewish Student Association.

Outreach program discussed

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Harlene Winnick Appelman of Detroit, creator of Jewish Experience for Families, made her Canadian debut last month at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

Over two days, Appelman shared some of her program ideas with representatives of Jewish organizations in the city, as well as with members of the general public.

The Director of Outreach and Education for the Jewish Federation of Metro Detroit, Appelman was brought to Winnipeg by the Jewish family education subcommittee of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's Jewish continuity committee.

"Our goal in bringing Harlene in was to give us ideas about how to get Jewish families more involved in Jewish education, the synagogues and the community," says Judi Shuster, chair of the subcommittee.

"Our committee is also charged with encouraging the different organizations in the community to get to know each other and work together."

Appelman's first presentation was to organization representatives. She outlined a number of successful outreach programs that she has developed in Detroit. One pre-Rosh Hashanah program, for example, attracted 2,000 people. Apples and Honey and Lots, Lots More featured a variety of hands-on demonstrations, including how to blow a shofar. There were also bee keepers and honey producers, people dressed as bees and apples, storytelling for children and programs for all ages.

A Shavuot program she created centred on "gardening Jewishly," she said. Participants were encouraged to designate the corners of their gardens for the food banks and to plant flowers to decorate the Shabbat table and the sukkah in the fall.

In a presentation to about 85 parents and grandparents, she spoke about creating lasting values in a "throwaway world."

Appelman's presentations were the first major program arranged by the family education subcommittee, which was established early this year.

"We were very pleased with the response," says Shuster. "All the group representatives were excited about working together on joint community-wide programs."

Halifax couple honored

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — A lifetime of dedication by a husband and wife team was recognized recently at the Beth Israel Synagogue in Halifax.

Jayson and Ann Greenblatt were honored at a Chai Kiddush for service they gave unselfishly for more than 40 years.

Jayson Greenblatt, a retired defence scientist with the federal government, served a record 24 years on the synagogue's board of governors – as secretary, vice-president and for an unprecedented three separate multi-year terms as president. He was an active member of most shul committees over the years and a member of the chevrah kadishah.

"No task was ever too complex or challenging and even the most menial and humble tasks are carried out with dignity and dispatch," longtime friend Earle Bowman told the congregation. "He has been an innovator and [has] a genius for organization."

Greenblatt spearheaded some of the most successful UJA and Israeli Bond Campaigns in Halifax and has been a leader in Canadian Jewish Congress and the Weizmann Institute of Science.

Ann Greenblatt was instrumental in planning and equipping the kitchen of the new Beth Israel Synagogue when it was built in 1957. As president of the sisterhood, she took a major role in fundraising, adding fresh ideas and special decorative themes to make the Sisterhood Bazaar one of the most successful events the sisterhood ran.

Now in their early 70s, both continue to be active in synagogue affairs.

Conversion bill to create new problems, CZF told

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — If the Knesset passes a new Who is a Jew bill delegitimatizing Conservative and Reform Jews by allowing only Orthodox converts to make use of the Law of Return, "it will open an abyss you cannot imagine," an Ontario academic told the recent annual Canadian Zionist Federation, eastern region (CZF) seminar.

"For the first time, there is the real possibility of saying that certain Jewish groups are treif," McMaster University professor emeritus Louis Greenspan told about 100 participants at the Beth Zion Synagogue.

"The Jewish people are facing a monster...[of] intolerance and misplaced zealotry."

Greenspan's comments were made in the context of the seminar's theme of pluralism in Israel 100 years after the founding of modern Zionism.

The theme also proved ample impetus for other panelists on the seminar, which included Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) director Prof. Fred Krantz, McGill University Political Science Prof. Harold Waller, and Mooli Brog, education emissary for the Jewish National Fund (JNF).

'An abyss you cannot imagine'

Greenspan said after the 1967 Six Day War, when Israel occupied the West Bank, the pluralism that once existed to affirm Jewish unity was overtaken by the agenda of followers of Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook, who saw the takeover as part of the messianic redemption of the Land of Israel.

Those believers were willing to accept religious pluralism in Israel in the sense that they felt Conservative and Reform Judaism to be inconsequential. "They [the messianic Jews] don't care about them."

But at a political level, "God's politics, not human politics, now had claim over the sovereignty of all the land," Greenspan said.

He said Israel's Orthodox, which include some Jews who do not recognize the state, are still ready to use "the good offices of the state" to delegitimatize Conservative and Reform Judaism.

Two fundamental questions for Greenspan are: can a Jewish state be truly pluralistic, and can it be secular?

It's "problematic," is his answer.

A Jewish State, for one thing, can't be as Jewish, as "England is English," because non-Jews in Israel become Israelis, but not Jews.

The problem of Israel being both Jewish and secular resulted from compromises made by David Ben-Gurion. But they are coming to a head and are yet to be solved, Greenspan suggested.

Greenspan thought they would be one day, "but only after much struggle.

"The concept of a Jewish state in a democratic context is very tough. When there is a conflict, it has to be resolved in the courts."

Sponsors of the seminar included Bank Hapoalim, Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region, CIJR, and JNF.

Ottawa chevrah kadishah gets a new home

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Over 400 members of the Ottawa Jewish Community recently attended a dedication ceremony for the new home of the chevrah kadishah (burial society) at 1771 Cuba Ave.

The original facility on King Edward Avenue, formerly the site of Adath Jeshurun Congregation, opened its doors as a memorial chapel in 1953, but is no longer adequate for the community's needs.

Ottawa's chevrah kadishah is operated completely by volunteers.

At the dedication ceremony, a plaque was presented to longtime volunteer Sam Petigorsky, who has served the community for half a century, following in the footsteps of his father.

The new facility, set to open on Dec. 2, is both larger and more modern than the old. It also features a room downstairs where kohanim and others can view the proceedings on television monitors.

Endometriosis a chronic disease facing women

By DR. WUSUN PAEK

Endometriosis, a chronic disease, strikes about 10 to 15 percent of women.

The problem with its detection is that nothing about it is typical. There is a wide range of symptoms and even with treatment, recurrence is unpredictable.

TO YOUR HEALTH

A wide spectrum of women, from teenage to menopausal age (on hormones), are afflicted. To complicate matters, endometriosis may be present in an advanced stage with no symptoms, or may be mild with many symptoms including extremely painful periods.

Endometriosis occurs when tissue similar to the lining of the uterus (endometrial tissue) implants itself outside the uterus, usually in the pelvic area. It is most commonly found on the ovaries, but it can be found anywhere in the pelvis or abdomen, including the bowel and bladder.

As a woman goes through her menstrual cycle, the endometrial tissue outside of the uterus grows, just as the lining of the uterus grows.

Stimulation of the endometrial tissue may lead to bleeding and scarring, and on the ovaries, may evolve into a cyst called an endometrioma.

Most women experience some degree of menstrual flow through the fallopian tubes into the pelvic area. A widely accepted theory is that women with endometriosis have an altered immune system that is unable to dispose of these endometrial cells.

The most common symptom of endometriosis is pain. Typically, a woman may experience painful periods that gradually get worse with time. Other symptoms include painful intercourse, painful bowel movements and symptoms similar to a urinary tract infection. A woman may also have pelvic pain at other times in her cycle.

Another common symptom is infertility. Endometriosis is found in 30 to 40 percent of infertile women. Severe endometriosis can distort a woman's fallopian tubes or interfere with her ovaries, causing problems with ovulation. The alteration in her immune system may also be a cause of fertility problems.

Women who have endometriosis may take longer to conceive and may need assistance with reproduction. For women hoping to conceive, it is best to do so in the first six to nine months after treatment for the disease.

Because endometriosis is almost impossible to definitively diagnose without surgery, a doctor may initially prescribe traditional treatments for the pain such as the birth control pill or anti-inflammatory drugs. However, if the pain does not subside with such medications, this is a good indication that the disease may be present.

Surgery involves inserting a laparoscope through the navel, which provides a video image of the pelvic area.

It provides the surgeon with an opportunity to treat any endometriosis that may be present, by destroying endometriotic lesions and removing any nodules or cysts. Endometriosis can look like a lot of different things, so the surgery requires a specialist.

Even with surgery, there is no guarantee that all endometrial tissue can be removed. To help prevent recurrence or to complete treatment, various medical treatments can be prescribed.

Two of the most common medical therapies for endometriosis are analogs of a gonadotrophin releasing hormone (GNRH) and Danazol. These drugs create a temporary menopausal state by shutting down a women's monthly hormonal activity and consequently, stopping further growth of endometriotic tissue. They are usually only prescribed for six months because of possible side effects such as osteoporosis .

Common therapies

Another treatment often prescribed after surgery is the continuous birth control pill. With this treatment, a woman no longer gets her menstrual period. Women can stay on this treatment until she decides to have children.

In extreme cases, and if a woman is past her childbearing years, she may undergo a hysterectomy, which in addition to the removal of the uterus, will remove as much endometriotic tissue as possible. This type of surgery is reserved as a treatment of last resort.

Although endometriosis is not easily detected, once a diagnosis is made, a woman can be attuned to early symptoms and seek medical assistance as soon as a recurrence occurs.

Women may also help control the disease through good nutrition and exercise.

Since endometriosis is a disease that affects every woman differently, it is important to remember that what works for one may not work for another. Through regular consultations with a specialist and self-education, the disease can be controlled.

Chanukah Continuity Campaign

As our way of helping to ensure the irreversibility of Jewish continuity, The CJN is launching a special continuity subscription campaign in time for Chanukah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $14.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Over the past few years, The CJN has grown and evolved into an award-winning national community newspaper widely read both here in Canada and abroad. We are extremely proud of this publication. Could there be a better gift at Chanukah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Sincerely,

Mordechai Ben-Dat

Holocaust poems set to music

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Toronto Children's Chorus, under the leadership of founder/music director Jean Ashworth Bartle, recently performed the world premiere of For the Children, a commemoration of the experiences of Holocaust victims and survivors.

The commissioned work, composed by Robert Evans and funded by the Laidlaw Foundation, sets to music the poems of children imprisoned at Terezin in North Bohemia, a Nazi holding camp. Narrated by Jan Rubes and Laura Cameron, and accompanied by the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, the cantata formed part of the concert, Terezin Remembered, held at Temple Sinai.

Choir members, Rubes and Cameron, a child about the same age as the children in the poetry, recounted conflicting sentiments of courage, despair and optimism held by the children.

"The world's abloom and seems to smile. I want to fly but where? How high? If in barbed wire, things can bloom, why couldn't I? I will not die," was written by one Terezin prisoner.

Another child, Franticek Bass wrote "The rose, the rose, how marv'llously sweet is smell, The scent wafts far over the countryside, This rose, the scent wafts far, The sweet, familiar scent drifts 'er the sorrowful fields, Alas, already it withers, the rose, the scent dies, that wonderful fragrance, that resplendent rose. That rose, the rose."

Evans says, "I had these poems translated and was immediately seduced. They sang. I felt as though I had to follow the children in their voyage from home in Prague to their deaths in Auschwitz. I wanted to explore their stark reversals of emotion – from joyous reflection to the imminent possibility of death from disease, malnutrition or exhaustion.

"The wonder and awe of a birdsong, a mouse or a butterfly, while they had tears streaming down their faces at having witnessed some atrocity...these children had the ability to turn around and see some new image for what it was, not as a reflection of what it had just been."

Complementing the 30-minute, 18-piece cantata was a medley of works entitled Songs of Hope. Selections included Time, by Srul Irving Glick, Somewhere by Leonard Bernstein and Here's to Song by Allistair MacGillivray and arranged by Lydia Adams.

Paul Mathew is working on music to highlight the silent film era.

Pianist Paul Mathew carries on family musical tradition

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like his grandfather and father before him, Paul Mathew, 45, is carrying on the tradition of a musical family, recently forming a new band, Soul of the Gypsy.

His late grandfather, Gershon Berul, played in the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, while his father, Bill Berle, former musical director at the Royal Alexandra Theatre, is still active as an orchestra leader.

Recognizing the resurgence of nostalgia, Mathew, a pianist who also plays other instruments, is working on a live show highlighting the music of the silent film era, from 1915 to 1929. He hopes to have mimes emulating the famous comics of those days.

His first venture into show business was the successful From Broadway to Klezmer at the Leah Posluns Theatre in October, where he led a 10-piece show band.

With The Soul of the Gypsy, Mathew hopes to capitalize on the liking for klezmer music, which had its beginnings in gypsy tunes. Colorful costumes are available if desired.

He says tastes have changed greatly since he first organized his own band at the age of 20. "Today, at 90 percent of bar mitzvahs, there is a disc jockey instead of a band, and even though there is still live music at a majority of weddings, disc jockeys are making inroads there too, as is very evident in the United States."

In large part, he attributes this to the fact that the bar mitzvah boy or bat mitzvah girl makes the decision about the kind of music needed, instead of the parents who still foot the bill. At weddings, the bride and groom make the decision, even though parents still pay, he says.

This is a negative development in Mathew's opinion because it means the end of music for every generation at these events. "For anybody over 50, forget it."

Clinton urges Israel, PA to move on peace talks

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON — President Bill Clinton has called on Israel and the Palestinians to "intensively" tackle the next set of issues to move the peace process forward.

In an extraordinarily blunt appeal to both sides, Clinton castigated them for putting brinkmanship ahead of cooperation, and urged them to "realize the need for urgency," because "the window of progress will become smaller with time."

Clinton made his comments at a White House ceremony at which he accepted the 1997 Man of Peace Award from a foundation established in honor of the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and his successor Shimon Peres.

The event drew a high-profile audience that included former secretaries of state Warren Christopher and Cyrus Vance; Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel; Joint Chief of Staff Gen. Harry Shelton and his predecessor Gen. Colin Powell; the ambassadors of Israel, Jordan, and Egypt; and officials from the Arab and Jewish-American communities.

With Peres and Leah Rabin at his side at the East Room event, Clinton spoke about his close relationship with Rabin. He mentioned that on a table in his office one floor above sits the kippah he wore at Rabin's funeral, along with a stone from the grave site, and one of the last photographs taken of the two together, of Clinton adjusting Rabin's bow tie.

Clinton restated the so-called four-part agenda that the administration had identified in September as necessary for proceeding beyond the interim-phase negotiations: security cooperation, the IDF's required redeployments, a "time-out on provocative actions," and moving to final-status talks.

"By addressing these issues, we can establish for Israelis and Palestinians that peace will bring tangible benefits. By speeding the progress on this track, we can move closer to invigorating negotiations between Israel and Lebanon, and Israel and Syria, to establish a lasting and comprehensive peace," Clinton said.

"In recent months, you have to acknowledge, at least, that the pace of change has slowed and that the bonds of trust have eroded on both sides," he said. "The answer is not to bemoan the present condition, but to renew our resolve to move forward."

Clinton paid tribute to Peres for having "stayed true to the path" of peace after Rabin's assassination and added, "We know from experience both before and since that progress is possible and progress is difficult, that barriers fall only if people show a consistent and constant will to move forward, guided by and bound to several principles...Israelis and Palestinians must embrace the spirit at the heart of the Oslo Accords, not jockeying for advantage but working together for the benefit of both sides.

"Both sides must dedicate themselves to building confidence step by step, through a series of agreements on issues affecting both Palestinians and Israelis. Both sides must refrain from actions that undermine the joint pledge they have made to strengthen security. Both sides must approach each other as partners joined by the prospect of peace and security. And both sides must live up to the letter and the spirit of their obligations."

In a briefing later in the day, State Department spokesperson Tom Foley said the United States is "impatient...with the lack of progress on the tough issues" of the four-part agenda. "We want to see progress. And we're hoping that the leaders in the region will demonstrate the commitment to treating each side as partners and to taking each other's needs into account and to taking bold steps to meet each other half way," Foley said.

Lieberman leaves Israel's PMO

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's right-hand man, Avigdor Lieberman, has resigned as director-general of the Prime Minister's Office.

A statement from the office said Netanyahu was saddened by Lieberman's decision to hand in his letter of resignation Sunday, adding that the premier regretted the departure of the person who had stood by him for many years.

But some senior Likud ministers welcomed the move, blaming Lieberman for recent upheavals in the party.

Commentators said Lieberman's departure could be viewed as further confirmation of Netanyahu's eroding control over his own party.

They noted that while Netanyahu and Lieberman were parting over some differences of opinion, it was widely believed that Lieberman was leaving his post to bolster support for Netanyahu within Likud, an activity he was officially prevented from doing because of his position as a civil servant.

Lieberman's departure is believed to have been precipitated by Netanyahu's announcement last week that he had decided to put a referendum before all of the Likud's rank-and-file members on whether or not party primaries should be held to determine the slate of Knesset candidates in the next election.

Lieberman is widely believed to have been behind a Likud party convention decision earlier this month to cancel the primaries, returning selection of Likud legislative candidates to the party's central committee — which is stacked with Netanyahu supporters.

The controversial decision was described as undemocratic by several Likud ministers, Knesset members and party officials.

It also sparked moves by party rebels to take control of the party and perhaps support a no-confidence vote in the government.

Netanyahu's announcement of a referendum, presumably a bid to appease those critics, apparently angered Lieberman, who was not consulted on the matter. Lieberman, a controversial figure in the prime minister's office, has been caught up in some of the scandals that developed during Netanyahu's tenure.

Earlier this year, the attorney general and state attorney, citing a lack of sufficient evidence, closed an investigation into Lieberman's alleged role in connection with improprieties surrounding the short-lived January appointment of Jerusalem lawyer Roni Bar-On as attorney general.

Lieberman also went head-to-head with the Israel Broadcasting Authority when he presented inaccurate revenue figures for Israel Television before a Knesset committee.

LA rabbi played key role in meeting

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Last week's hastily arranged meeting between Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and King Hussein of Jordan came about in a most intriguing way.

While driving to a doctor's appointment Nov. 13, Rabbi Marvin Hier, founder and dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, received a call on his cell phone from Hussein, then in Washington, saying he was sending his personal aide to Los Angeles on an important mission.

The next morning the aide, Gen. Ali Shukri, arrived at the Wiesenthal Centre carrying a message from the king. It said Hussein wanted to restore his country's frayed relationship with Israel and could meet Netanyahu at Hussein's London home on Nov. 18.

According to Hier, Shukri stressed four points motivating the monarch: to re-establish high-level intelligence exchanges; to assess the outstanding issues of Palestinian airport and seaport facilities; to discuss a possible moratorium on Hamas terrorist activities; and to cement the personal relationship between Hussein and Netanyahu.

Hier said he immediately got in touch with Yoram Ben Ze'ev, Israel's consul general in Los Angeles, who conveyed the invitation directly to Netanyahu.

The details were finalized Nov. 17, when Hussein phoned Netanyahu as the prime minister was touring the Wiesenthal Centre's Museum of Tolerance.

Hier said he and the king had established a warm personal relationship when the Jordanian monarch toured the Wiesenthal Centre last year, and that the king had invited the rabbi to visit him at the Mayo Clinic during his recent illness.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 17

• Israel's attorney general Elyakim Rubinstein asked U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno to free Jonathan Pollard. Absorption Minister Yuli Edelstein will meet Pollard on Nov. 24.

• Israel and Jordan agreed to start negotiations on a free trade agreement.

Nov. 18

• Senior Israeli and Palestinian negotiators held talks in Jericho on outstanding aspects of the 1995 Interim Agreement, including an airport in Gaza and a safe-passage route between the West Bank and Gaza.

Nov. 19

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and King Hussein met near London in their first face-to-face talks since the failed assassination attempt on Khaled Meshal in Jordan in September.

Nov. 20

• One yeshivah student, Gavriel Hirschberg, was killed and his friend, Benny Dil, was injured in a shooting in Jerusalem's Old City.

• Ariel Sharon gave President Bill Clinton's national security adviser, Sandy Berger, detailed maps of Israel's proposed final-status borders.

Nov. 21

• In an effort to stave off a revolt within his own party, Netanyahu proposed going to the party's general membership of more than 200,000 to ask them whether the Knesset list should be chosen by a primaries-system vote or by central committee selection.

• Israel announced it will block an attempt by the PA to conduct a census in East Jerusalem.

Fifty Years Ago in Palestine
(Nov. 21)

JERUSALEM — The first British freighter to be assigned to the task of evacuating British military supplies from Palestine arrived in Haifa today and is expected to begin loading next week. It was learned that other ships, totalling in all some 300,000 tons, are expected to complete the withdrawal of British forces and their supplies within six months.

Arabs boycott Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The decision by most Arab states to boycott the fourth annual Middle East and North African economic conference, held in Qatar from Nov. 16 to 18, was yet another jolting reminder of Israel's growing isolation in the Arab world since Benjamin Netanyahu's election as prime minister in June 1996.

Despite strenuous efforts by U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine to head off a boycott, the PLO and all but six member states of the Arab League – Qatar, Oman, Jordan, Tunisia, Yemen and Mauritania – stayed away from the conference in Doha.

Conspicuous by their absence were Egypt (the host of last year's forum in Cairo), Saudi Arabia and Morocco, which hosted the first meeting in Casablanca. Upset by the boycott, Israel sent a lower-level delegation, led by Trade and Industry Minister Natan Sharansky rather than Foreign Minister David Levy.

Significantly, the conference began and ended with statements critical of Israel's stance toward the Palestinians.

Launched in the afterglow of Israel's rapprochement with the PLO in 1993, the conference was originally designed to foster closer relations between Israel and its Arab neighbors and to bring foreign investment to the region.

Four years on, the first goal has been partially met. But Israel's hopes of integrating itself into the area have all but been dashed on the rock of Arab anger with its policies and Arab fears of Israeli economic domination.

Netanyahu came into office with a promise that he would be faithful to the Oslo accords, which he had consistently reviled. Aside from fulfilling Israel's pledge to redeploy from Hebron, Netanyahu has not pushed the peace process forward.

Contrary to the agreements signed in 1994 and 1995, he has not given the Palestinians a safe passage route from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank; he has not released all Palestinian prisoners; he has not let the Palestinian Authority (PA) open an airport and a seaport in Gaza. Neither has he satisfied Palestinian demands for substantial withdrawals from rural sectors of the West Bank.

But worst of all, from the PA's point of view, he has begun building in Har Choma, reinstated grants and tax breaks to settlers living beyond the Green Line, expanded existing settlements, claimed at least half of the West Bank and ruled out the prospect of a sovereign and independent Palestinian state, the Palestinians' holy grail.

In the face of these policies and pronouncements, the sputtering state of Israel's bilateral negotiations with the Palestinians, the cessation of talks between Israel and Syria and the suspicion and mistrust in which Netanyahu is held by Arab leaders, the Arabs have tried to turn the tables on Israel.

In October 1996, four months after an Arab summit in Cairo warned Israel to hew to the principle of trading land for peace, and less than a month after the worst Palestinian rioting in the territories since the Six Day War, Qatar postponed the opening of a trade office in Tel Aviv.

Two months later, Tunisia and Oman put relations with Israel on hold, and last March, at the behest of Syria, Arab League foreign ministers approved a resolution freezing the further normalization of relations with Israel.

Last July, at the United Nations, Arab states circulated a draft resolution seeking the curtailment of Israel's participation in the General Assembly. The petition failed.

More recently, Morocco pulled out of a Davis Cup tennis match with Israel, then cancelled a meeting of Mediterranean countries which it was to have hosted in Marrakech.

On the eve of last week's economic conference in Doha, Hosni Mubarak, the president of Egypt, claimed that Israel had broken its promises with respect to the peace process.

These developments, in tandem with the three suicide bombings which have rocked Israel since March, have thrown the Middle East back to the bad old days, and postponed the dawn of a new and hopeful era in the region.

between Israel and Turkey. Greece and Turkey have long been engaged in disputes over territorial rights in the Aegean Sea and over the divided island of Cyprus.

Some Jewish leaders maintained that the monument was delayed for decades by successive governments in Athens and by the Greek Orthodox Church.

Last year, a Holocaust memorial was unveiled in the northwestern Greek city of Kastoria to commemorate local Jews who perished at Auschwitz.

The monument was erected at the place where the Nazis, on March 24, 1944, gathered Kastoria's 1,000 Jews for deportation to Auschwitz. Only 35 survived the Holocaust.

At the start of the 20th century, there were some 75,000 Jews in Salonika — about half the city's population.

During the occupation of Greece, the Nazis destroyed nearly all of Salonika's Jewish sites. Approximately 67,000 Greek Jews were exterminated by the Nazis.

Harbourfront Authors Festival

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The 18th International Harbourfront Authors Festival recently brought an eclectic mix of writers to Toronto from all over the world. No Israeli writers were included this time, but there were still plenty of Jewish authors, an assortment as diverse as the literary world itself.

American writer Erica Jong, best known for her sexually explicit 1973 bestseller Fear of Flying, came to peddle her seventh novel, Inventing Memory: A Novel of Mothers and Daughters (HarperCollins, $35.50), a four-generational family saga stretching between Russia circa 1880 and America in 2005.

"I was never much interested in my roots until I hit my 50th birthday," Jong admitted before her reading. "I grew up in an assimilated family. No one cared much about religion until they got very old and began muttering prayers in Hebrew. And the same thing happened to me."

The book borrows a line from Isaac Bashevis Singer, who once said the Jews were "a people who can't sleep and who don't let others sleep." According to Jong, "That's the best definition of the Jews that I've heard."

Since Inventing Memory contains letters, journal entries and various other literary contrivances to advance the story, Jong called it a "collage novel," and says this scrapbook approach has become the great American literary format of our age.

Inventing Memory may be true to its name in an unintentional sense, since Jong seems to dip into the soup pot of life in Russia and the soup pot of life in America with the same ladle. For this reader, she mixes up the tastes of both and essentially reinvents her characters' familial past for modern consumption.

American literary critic Alfred Kazin spoke on the subject of his latest book, God and the American Writer (Knopf, $35), namely, the supreme relevance of God to public discourse in America in the last century versus God's supreme irrelevance to public discourse today.

Whether they were believers or not, writers like Nathaniel Hawthorne, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Emily Dickenson and Herman Melville were consumed with issues of God and morality, Kazin said. Slavery, the supreme issue of the day, inspired an intensely moral and religious literature.

"[Stowe's] Uncle Tom's Cabin was viewed by [Abraham] Lincoln himself as the book that started the Civil War," he said.

Kazin said he once heard a southern critic say that Ralph Waldo Emerson – the essayist who advanced the notions that organized religion is hypocrisy and that God is within – "was responsible for Hitler, that his ideas led to a public disorder."

He described Melville's Moby Dick as "the greatest story that speaks of America's relation to God.

"Whatever people [in America] believe about religion today, there's a marked lack of intensity as compared to the 19th century," he said, adding that some groups still seem concerned with the burning issues of Lincoln's time.

"Only the other day the Southern Baptists issued an apology for their support of slavery," Kazin noted. "Then, to show how busy they are, they went right out to convert the Jews."

Arnon Grunberg, a 26-year-old native of Amsterdam, wrote the novel Blue Monday (Farrar, Straus & Giroux, $31) on a dare. It has sold 70,000 copies in Holland and been republished in various translations.

Blue Monday has been compared to Philip Roth's Goodbye Columbus; Grunberg's often-pixilated protagonist, also called Arnon, is a sort of Jewish Casanova who vividly records his colorful and occasionally hilarious adventures and misadventures with a series of prostitutes.

Grunberg has a tight writing style that is colorful and hip, and he says he works hard to make the writing seem effortless. "The most important rule about writing about sex is you should not attempt to do it when you are dying to have sex," he advises.

Wallace Shawn is known to many for his roles in movies like My Dinner With Andre (which he co-wrote), The Princess Bride and several Woody Allen films.

He is also an avant-garde playwright whose latest work The Designated Mourner (Noonday Press, $14) opened in London last year and has been made into a film starring Mike Nichols.

Interviewed on stage by Toronto actor Clare Coulter, the curmudgeonly actor-writer admitted that when he works, "I don't start with the idea and then write the piece. First I write and then I have the idea."

Shawn's plays often confront painfully difficult and ugly elements of the human condition. While many critics have been perplexed and disgruntled by them in the past, some are now starting to react with favor, even excitement, according to Shawn.

"At first my writing got almost entirely bad reviews, and the second time out it was almost the same, and it kept being like that," he said, adding that something happens when playwrights stick with their chosen craft and don't give up.

"After a long time almost everybody begins to think, 'Why is he still around? There's got to be something there.' Some critics called [my play] The Fever 'ridiculous garbage' 10 years ago, and now they're saying it's 'a fine masterwork.'"

Toronto author Anne Michaels, whose year-old first novel Fugitive Pieces (McClelland & Stewart, $19.99) has won many prestigious awards, sold hundreds of thousands of copies and been translated into many languages, says the subject of the Holocaust drew her in like "a black hole of history.

"I think that certain questions hunt you down until you can't escape," she told interviewer Evan Solomon. "I think at a certain point it becomes harder to not write than to write. This was certainly the case here. The characters were extremely vivid and came to me with an astonishing intensity."

In response to a question about the difficulties of writing of experiences that weren't her own, she quoted "the famous dictum by Adorno – 'No poetry after Auschwitz.' [What Adorno was saying is that] one does not write about this. When he made that statement, I think it was extremely important, not only because it was showing respect for the dead and respect for the events themselves, the enormity of them, but in that statement he was also saying, 'Silence is the only response right now, let's hold our tongues and think about this.'

"Now time has gone by and the participants in these events are dying. And the questions remain – they won't go away – and the moral imperative is shifting. Whereas they used to say, 'I must not speak about this because I have not lived it,' now they say, 'I must speak about this because I have not lived it.'"

Stage-struck actress loves theatre

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Niki Landau has no illusions about life on the stage.

TORONTO — There may be more money in film and TV, but Niki Landau loves the stage and she's going to stick with it, come hell or high water.

Currently she is appearing as Amanda, a gangster's daughter who plans to murder her evil father in George Walker's comic play Criminal Genius, part of the Suburban Motel series at Factory Theatre. It continues in repertory through December (504-9971).

The Toronto actor, daughter of Sy and Barbara Landau, has no illusions about life on the stage. "I've managed to survive so far, but there is no such thing as making it in Canadian theatre. You can easily become quite forgotten. But in the last couple of years, I've been working with amazing and fascinating characters."

She has one major regret, that Kindertransport, in which she played one of the children sent off to England to escape the Holocaust, has not yet been produced in Toronto. She appeared in Kindertransport in 1995 for the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre and was in the same play in Saskatoon for Persephone Theatre.

In that play, the 25-year-old actor plays Eva from age nine to 17, a girl who changes her religion and identity to escape, is raised by a non-Jewish woman in England and can't become reconciled with her own mother later.

A graduate of York Mills Collegiate, Landau took acting lessons from the late Judy Silver at the Leah Posluns Theatre and at the age of 10, played in The King of Petticoat Lane at that theatre. She has dedicated her performance in Criminal Genius to Silver.

Still determined to make the grade in Canadian theatre, she left Toronto to take a theatre performance course at Concordia University in Montreal.

While in Montreal, she appeared as Portia in a National Film Board production of Shylock, which examined the question of Shakespeare's anti-Semitism and included a panel discussion on the subject filmed at the Saidye Bronfman Centre.

GODFREYS WIN PRIZE IN ANGLO-JEWISH HISTORY

Sheldon and Judith Godfrey of Toronto have become the first Canadians and only the second North Americans to win the coveted prize for the best Anglo-Jewish History from the Jewish Historical Society of England.

The Godfreys won the A.S. Diamond Memorial Prize for their book Search Out The Land: The Jews and the Growth of Equality in British Colonial America, 1740-1867, published by McGill-Queens University Press.

Sheldon is a lawyer and businessman with a postgraduate degree in Canadian history, and a past chair of the Heritage Canada Foundation.

Judith Godfrey is a former vice-chair of Ontario's Conservation Review Board. Search Out The Land won the Joseph and Faye Tanenbaum Award as the best Canadian Jewish history of 1996.

Hebraica at Sotheby's: A manuscript fragment of the Prophets dating from 1100 CE, three leaves from a 14th-century Bible and several 14th-century manuscripts of Exodus are among the Hebraic items included in a sale of Western manuscripts and miniatures at Sotheby's London on Dec. 2.

The Hebrew manuscripts are from the Comites Latentes Collection, formerly on deposit at the National Library, Jerusalem, and from the estate of the late Neil F. Phillips.

Also on sale are a commentary on Aristotle by Averroes, circa 1500; concordances to the Bible and the Talmud by Abraham ben Meshullam, dated 1575; and an 18th-century megillah. A full catalogue may be obtained for about $35 from Sotheby's, 0171-314-4444. Fax 0171-408-5909.

Bloor JCC Reading: The Bloor JCC Between Stages reading series, in association with Volcano and Factory Theatre, present a public reading of Cherry Docs, an explosive new play by David Gow. In this high-octane drama, a Jewish lawyer works with a neo-Nazi skinhead accused of a racial murder to prepare a defence for his trial. Dec. 1, 7 p.m., Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. at Bloor Street. Free admission. 416-924-6211.

Governor General's Award: Jane Urquhart, author of The Underpainter, is the winner of the Canada Council for the Arts Governor General's Literary Award in the category of English-language fiction. The Underpainter (McClelland & Stewart, $29.99) tells the story of a minimalist painter who is drawn back into his past in the World War I era. The award was announced Nov. 18 in Ottawa.

The award is another major feather in the cap for M&S's chief fiction editor, Ellen Seligman, who was responsible for bringing last year's immensely successful novel Fugitive Pieces by Anne Michaels to the attention of the world.

More Book Talk: At the recent opening party of Heather Reisman's mega-bookstore Indigo in midtown Toronto, mayor-elect Mel Lastman offered congratulations, noting the huge square-footage of Indigo and reminding Reisman not to neglect her tax bills.

Still hoarse from his non-stop mayoralty campaign, "Hizzoner" gave his charming spiel, stopped to chat briefly with Al Waxman, then ambled out to his chauffeur-driven limousine (licence plate: 1 MAYOR), which was parked by a fire hydrant and guarded by a policeman.

Greg Gatensby, director of the Harbourfront International Festival of Authors, was among the huge crowd at the Indigo opening. He told me of his surprise and puzzlement that Israeli author David Grossman had agreed to appear at the Jewish Book Fair but had declined an appearance only a week earlier at the larger Harbourfront fest.

Perhaps the Harbourfront dates had clashed with Grossman's schedule? "It's doubtful," Gatensby said. "We invited him eight months before."

At the Galleries: An exhibition of art by Norman Laliberte, consisting of acrylic and oil paintings and mixed media works, is on view at the Odon Wagner Gallery, 196 Davenport Rd., Toronto. Laliberte's vibrantly colorful works are whimsical, surreal and life-affirming: his central imagery is characterized by fruits, hearts, stars, rabbits and flowers. Thru Dec. 24. 416-962-0438.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

BIBLICAL MILITARY HISTORY

Published earlier this year by Stoddart, Battles of the Bible (320 pages, $34.95) revisits the major biblical military campaigns, such as the invasion of Canaan by the Israelites under Joshua, the conquest of the kingdom under David and Solomon, the split of the kingdom into Judah and Israel, and the Maccabees' successful rebellion against Seleucid domination.

This is a second, considerably revised edition of a significant work of scholarship first published in 1978. It was written by two eminent Israeli military historians and commanders: the late Israeli president Chaim Herzog, and Tel Aviv University archeology professor Mordechai Gichon. Both had served in senior posts in Israel's military establishment, and thus were able to show the continuing military importance of various biblical sites from ancient times to the present day.

The book provides an essential key to understanding the military campaigns of the biblical era, when the struggle for independence and survival overshadowed all other aspects of daily life. It also takes into account current historical and archeological research, as well as modern trends in biblical scholarship.

Featuring dozens of maps, drawings and photographs, Battles of the Bible enlivens and modernizes a complex subject, making it accessible to the average reader.

Laromme Jerusalem Hotel: This famous deluxe hotel is celebrating Israel's 50th birthday with some special winter guest packages. Parents visiting children who are students in Israel are upgraded to maximum rooms and receive homemade chocolates upon arrival. Students may share their parents' rooms free and enjoy a complimentary breakfast. Parents who stay seven consecutive nights receive the eighth night free and the student joins them for a bonus Friday dinner or Saturday lunch.

As well, the Laromme offers a 30 percent discount on the Israeli room rate for Israeli families who join their overseas families for a Shabbat at the hotel. Israeli grandchildren receive a 50 percent discount on Friday dinner and Saturday lunch.

For more details, contact the Laromme Jerusalem Hotel (phone 02-6756666 or fax 02-6756777) or any travel agent specializing in Israel.

Vancouver Holocaust Exhibit: Open Hearts – Closed Doors, an exhibit that opened this month at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre, marks the 50th anniversary of the arrival to Canada of 1,123 Jewish children who were orphaned by the Holocaust.

The exhibit chronicles the lives of these children as they emerged from the events of the Holocaust into displaced persons camps and orphanages, and eventually boarded ships to Canada.

It presents a snapshot of Canada's treatment of other immigrants, including the forced return of persons from India aboard the Komagata Maru, the Asiatic Exclusion Act and the Japanese internment. #50 - 950 W. 41st Ave., Vancouver. 604-264-0499.

Kosher Safari: If you think an African safari consists of only lions, elephants, rhinos, zebras, buffalo and antelope, take another look. Thanks to the Norcross, Georgia-based adventure travel company Global Explorers you can enjoy kosher meals, daven daily and observe Shabbat in the bush.

Global Explorers' 12-day Kosher Safari and Wildlife Experience includes a safari in a private game reserve and a visit to a kosher guesthouse in Cape Town near nature reserves, botanical gardens and other attractions.

Kosher meals are provided under the strict rabbinical supervision of Mehadrin Min Hamehadrin.

Three trips departing from New York are offered in coming months: Jan. 18 to 30, Feb. 22 to Mar. 6, Mar. 22 to Apr. 3. Land costs are from $3,485, with a single supplement of $850; airfare is additional. 800-923-2645. Web site, [www.globalexplorers.com].

Recipe offered for correcting Canada's soccer woes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Few people around the world would associate Canada with excellence in soccer, but nevertheless, the national team's poor showing in World Cup qualifying matches is driving Canadian soccer fans crazy.

Canada's recent 3-0 drubbing at the hands of the United States was only the latest in a long series of embarrassing losses suffered by the national soccer team. Once again Canadians will be spectators, not participants, when the World Cup convenes in France next summer. In Canada's only World Cup appearance seven years ago, the Great White North failed to score even one goal against world class competition.

So what ails the national team? Is Canadian soccer really that bad?

Martin Scott is a soccer aficionado of the first order. President of the Maccabi (Toronto) Soccer Club, last year he also served as administrator of the Toronto Services Soccer League, the nation's largest soccer circuit with more than 160 teams.

Scott admits to "total frustration" at the national team's poor showing. Not content to limit himself to energy-depleting handwringing, Scott offers this prescription for turning around the national program:

Soccer Canada is in trouble. To clearly assess the current state of disrepair and disrepute, one must begin at the top. Leadership in Ottawa has proven itself to be much like the Canadian national team, disorganized, unmotivated and without a clear mandate or style. The lack of professionalism manifest in decisions taken by former coach Bob Lenarduzzi and the Canadian Soccer Association's president, K. Pipe, have effectively put the Canadian team into a vortex, with dissent both on and off the field.

In perhaps the most multicultural country in the world, Canada should prove an ideal source for the development of players with inherent national characteristics of their or their parent's homeland. So why isn't it working?

We are supposed to be operating under a "pyramid of play," which is a wonderful concept that is being executed by the CSA with the same degree of quality as a national team set piece. The pyramid of play is supposed to channel upwards elite players, competing ultimately against their peers.

Unless a knowledgeable recruiter/developer/coach is in place with CSA's backing, the pyramid of play is meaningless, as the wrong players are coming to the top. It is high time to go with a pro. Hire an experienced, international head coach on a six- to eight-year contract, with wide-ranging powers to glean, assemble, train and conduct Canada's national effort. Get Pipe out! Do an autopsy on the entire body because the body is dead.

The pyramid is flat at the top, with many leagues throughout the GTA that can all legitimately lay claim to having some of the best players in Canada. Each ethnic-based team has support from their community and in many cases their soccer team is the ultimate expression and focal point of their cultural identity.

With the Canadian National Soccer League (CNSL) joining the Ontario Soccer League in 1998, the opportunity does exist to begin to take a step towards a better semi-pro future, which sadly, seems the best Canadians can hope for.

Drawing their best players to the CNSL will be a difficult task. The reputation that an internationally known leader will bring to the national team will help convince these players and their supporters that this league can and will be a conduit to the national team or other international opportunities.

The double-edged sword of volunteerism also serves as a roadblock to the development of soccer in Canada. On the one hand, soccer today could not be the number 1 participation sport in Canada without countless people helping out at all levels of the game. On the other hand, soccer's amateurish status is reinforced by the very nature of the volunteer structure that guides it. With so many participants, is is not reasonable to assume that a small per person fee increase in the cost of participation could go a long way in making our game become more professional?

Some progressive soccer clubs have shown the courage and foresight to have made such appointments recently, mostly in the form of head coaches.

In soccer associations, on the other hand, far too many individuals achieve power or control as the direct result of years served and allegiances developed, as opposed to quality, insight or experience that a paid employee could bring to the table. Referee associations are also rife with petty politics and a general lack of professionalism. The three worst things about soccer in Canada just may be coaches, referees and administration. That's unfortunate, because the talent in term of players here is potentially world class, at least in the top 32.

Scott is keeping his organizational talents in gear this winter. He's entered the Maccabi AKs (alte kackers) in an over-35 league at the Hanger, a mega-sized indoor soccer facility operated by soccer maven Francois Glasman. Younger players with the Maccabi Soccer Club, many of whom represented Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel last summer, are participating in First Division Play at the Hanger. Scott is also working hard to put together a five-team invitational tournament next August that will feature Maccabi Toronto, Maccabi Montreal, Maccabi Glasgow and two regional Maccabi teams from the United States.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I am intelligent, honest and reliable. I also have a lot of practical work experience. So why can't I find a job? What are employers looking for today?

Dear Reader,

Recent studies across North America indicate that more than anything else, employers are looking for "soft" skills.

This includes skills like flexibility, adaptability, optimism, assertiveness and ability to manage stress, solve problems and get along with others.

In an age of computerization, does it make sense to stress "soft" skills? Many employers say yes.

Technology has dramatically increased the number and level of complications in the problems we must solve at work. This means that many jobs require teamwork.

In times of economic depression, optimism is the skill that will encourage a high level of sales.

These and other "soft" skills make up one's Emotional Intelligence (EQ), which is a new measurement that is proving to be a strong indicator of success in life.

The EQ was originally developed by Dr. Reuven Bar-On and is just beginning to be used by career counsellors. Read anything you see that talks about EQ – it's bound to become increasingly important.

Job Search is a monthly column by career educator Lisa Galet Klug. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

Scholar remembered for making Torah study sweet

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – A candy stuffed into information kits symbolized the approach to Torah study of renowned scholar and teacher Nehama Leibowitz, who died last spring.

Classes with Nehama, as she was affectionately known, always started with a candy, so that students would realize the sweetness of Torah study, said Judith Shapero, chair of a recent conference entitled Life and Legacy of Nehama Leibowitz.

Shapero spoke at the first evening of the four-day conference, which was sponsored by Beth Tikvah Synagogue, the Centre for Jewish Studies of York University and Jewish Campus Services, and supported by the Sally and Morris Justein Endowment Fund.

Evening keynote speaker Marla Frankel, of the Melton Centre for Jewish Education in the Diaspora at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, gave a brief overview of Leibowitz's life and teachings.

Born in Riga, Latvia, in 1905, Leibowitz was born to a wealthy family, and together with her brother, studied with private tutors. Her doctoral thesis was written in Germany, where she worked on a translation of the Bible with Martin Buber.

After marrying Yehuda Lipman, a much older man, the couple made aliyah in 1930.

Besides her regular teaching classes, Leibowitz, who was awarded the Israel Prize for Education in 1957, began to prepare weekly study sheets on the Torah portion of the week. Originally sent to 15 women from various kibbutzim, they proved immensely popular, and were eventually sent around the country.

The first sheets were designed for those with experience and knowledge in Torah study, Frankel said. Later, Leibowitz prepared study guides for those less knowledgeable. These were translated into many languages and sent around the world.

An Orthodox woman, and neither an "activist nor a feminist," Leibowitz achieved fame in what is usually considered a male preserve. She taught both men and women, and was asked to join the staff at Yeshivat Or Torah, a yeshivah presided over by Rabbi Shlomo Riskin.

Frankel taught a sample lesson that illustrated Leibowitz' technique of studying traditional texts together with both ancient and more modern interpretations.

Frankel said that "although she herself was Orthodox in practice, she never demanded [Orthodox practice] in her students." Her teaching and writing never reflected any political view, said Frankel.

Leibowitz was able to strike a balance between the explicit religiosity espoused by Rabbi Yosef Ber Soloveitchik (public expressions of religion such as kashruth) and Martin Buber's implicit religiosity, stressing the importance of one's own search for faith.

A video presentation The Life and Legacy of Nehama Leibowitz offered a tribute to her by Toronto educators who had studied with her.

Racists shunned

If Quebec voted 50 or more percent for separation "on a fair question," there would doubtless be a large number of Quebecers who would petition Ottawa to stay under Canadian law, Manning said.

"Parliament would have no alternative but to respect that request."

Manning admitted he is trying to strike "the delicate balance between not appearing to feed [the partitionist movement] and sticking his head in the sand..."

"Partition would be a huge problem but it's part of the reality; so that's another reason not to get into" Quebec secession, he reasoned.

Manning said the national unity debate will never be concluded unless the "equality of citizens and provinces in law," which is as important to Canadians in the rest of the country as recognition of its uniqueness is to Quebecers, is included in any resolution.

Mister Disc Jockey provides total entertainment

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

By now, you've probably heard the phrase "total entertainment." It sounds interesting, but what does it mean?

For a wedding, bar mitzvah or any milestone celebration, you want the best entertainment you can get, so why not investigate? Is it anything like virtual reality?

Yes and no. It does involve creating a total imaginary environment, but the performers are live artists, not images on a screen.

It means state of the art set design and audio-visual technology, plus the time-honored artistic values of good music and performance. It challenges the senses and imagination, lifts the human spirit, and takes the audience somewhere they never expected to go.

Ed McMurtry of Mister Disc Jockey (905-886-4488) pioneered seamless entertainment, where each phase of an event flows smoothly into the next. Now he has gone a step further, uniting seamless decor with interactive entertainment to create total entertainment.

In this concept, the guests are totally in the setting. They see the stage not as a stage, but part of the scene. The waitresses transform into dancers, taking part in the show. And the DJ's role is as flexible as that of any other performer. Sometimes he's the emcee, sometimes not, but he's never just a DJ. Whether disguised or hidden in the wings, he's one of the cast.

Total entertainment requires a coordinator, to get musicians, singers, dancers, actors and other artists working together. To find the best coordinator for your party, keep traditional performance values in mind, while staying abreast of recent developments. Lighting and visual effects, for example, are a specialty all their own, so choose someone who is up on the latest progress in this area.

You need someone who can deal with the unexpected – not only rare glitches like a lead singer coming down with laryngitis, but more common problems like bad weather or a fussy audience. The biggest surprise for a coordinator would be an event in which nothing surprising happened.

Of all kinds of events, McMurtry finds bar mitzvahs most demanding. One must entertain three or four generations, not just the kids – and sometimes be a sort of bouncer/diplomat. At a corporate event, if someone chucks a chair through a window, the thrower is arrested and fired. If this happens at a bar mitzvah, they blame the DJ.

The best entertainment companies are versatile. They can handle everything from a quiet, intimate gathering to a corporate gala. With professionals of this calibre, you can establish a long-term relationship. They can entertain at a wedding, where decorum is of the essence, or provide high jinks at a bar mitzvah, while keeping a lid on the rambunctiousness.

Look for someone with competent, experienced staff, who rehearse regularly and work closely with the best independent professionals in fields like decor. (In a visually sophisticated era, decor is crucial. The younger the audience, the greater the visual sophistication.)

Don't underestimate details. Party favors are a good example. They are souvenirs, emotional anchors the guests take home with them.Through them, the memory of one day or evening is preserved. This is why, for a party favor, a 40-year-old will charge across the floor just as fast as a 14-year old.

The interactive aspect of your entertainment starts six months to two years before your party, when you pick up the phone to dial a coordinator you've heard good things about. You should be giving each other input and feedback from that moment on.

Set your expectations high and let the professionals you hire give their best. A successful event is fun for them. It enhances their professional pride and it is the source of their good reputation and economic survival.

It's important to keep abreast of the times but the criteria for a good party are what they've always been. Do your guests stay until the latest possible hour? And do you, however tired you may be at the end of a long day, feel as good as your guests? With total entertainment which lives up to its name, your answer to both questions will be yes.

Get referrals when choosing florists, experts say

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

With so many florists to choose from, how do you know which is best for you? Then, what overall plan should you follow in working with them, up to and including the day of your special occasion?

Susan Perelman of Aviv Flowers (256-2554) and Elaine Birnbaum of Greenleaves & Petals (905-709-4080) have these suggestions to help you.

Before booking a florist, work out your budget range and decide which aspects of floral decor are absolutely essential, and which you can be flexible about. Consult everyone who has a key role in hosting the event and give yourself room to change your mind. Then the florist will be able to offer ideas that match your tastes and budget.

Besides recommendations from friends, get referrals from caterers and consultants. If you see floral arrangements you strongly like or dislike, Perelman says, find out who created them. This helps narrow your choice. Then pick three or four florists, make an appointment with each, and get their undivided attention for an hour.

Give them all the information they need. Show pictures that illustrate your taste in flower types, colors and arrangements, and get the florists to show you pictures of their work. Look at the flowers in their fridge, Perelman urges. Even if they aren't what you're looking for, they give an idea of the company's overall quality level.

Finally, she advises, have the terms of your business arrangements put in writing.

Birnbaum recommends picking someone who offers additional forms of decoration or "props" coordinated with floral arrangements, like balloons and linen. Together, these items contribute to the tone of the event. You may want flowers for adults' tables at a bar mitzvah, but jazzy non-floral centrepieces for the kids.

Besides the florist's talent, consider rapport and comfort level, and how you like his or her style. Can the florist be creative within the limits you set? Are you at ease telling each other what you like? You want input and ideas, but with no pressure. Out of professional pride and the desire for repeat business, Birnbaum says, no good florist will push you to spend more than you want.

Your florist should be a good, enthusiastic listener and able, says Perelman, to take a vague idea from you, develop it, and make it so clear and visible that you exclaim: "This is exactly what I want!" Also, Birnbaum encourages you not to be wary of your own original ideas. There's no mainstream anymore; anything goes.

The florist, Perelman emphasizes, complements the event, but does not set the tone. Flowers have to match the setting; if the florist does not know the location, he or she should make a point of going to see it. Will it be outdoors or indoors? A garden wedding, for example, might have fewer flowers. Inside, room shape, size, lighting and decor influence what floral colors show best.

The nature of the event itself is crucial, Perelman says. Flowers at a wedding, for instance, should complement the bride's gown. As a rule, Birnbaum says, a wedding means elegance, while a bar or bat mitzvah cries out for flamboyance.

After your first meeting with your florist, schedule another one fairly close to your celebration, when the florist should present samples of arrangements. Then meet again just before the event to arrange finishing touches. Finally, your florist should be present at the event.

Perelman and Birnbaum both put high value on trust. Suppose that you choose a type of flower, but when it comes in, its quality is poor. You have to feel safe trusting your florist as the expert to pick a replacement. Birnbaum thinks it advisable to strike a balance between trusting your florist, and making sure you have adequate input.

Book six months to a year ahead, advises Perelman – a year, if your event will take place in a busy season. For a wedding or a bar or bat mitzvah, Birnbaum advises, find your florist as soon as you've booked the venue. That gives you time to make sure the flowers match the joy of the occasion – and in busy seasons, to be certain the florist you want will be available.

Is Charlie a man or a dummy?

By DAYNA SHERECK
Special to The CJN

Automaton: Most of us have heard of the term, but not too many know what it means.

For some the term brings associations of explosives, something atomic. My own association was something automatic, like a certain kind of car.

In reality, there is nothing dangerous about it. No weapons, no bombs, not even cars! The actual definition of an automaton is a "person or machine that acts or appears to act in an automatic or mechanical way."

Charlie The Real Dummy, a half man/ half machine (automaton), is becoming the latest novelty at parties, corporate events and trade shows. Companies can ensure their products or services will be noticed by having Charlie The Real Dummy at their booth.

The fascinating thing about Charlie is that people can't figure out whether he is real or not. They can stare in amazement for hours and walk away still not knowing what it is. Typical comments are usually, "He looks real but no human could do this."

Charlie can be brought out just about anywhere and is sure to get attention. Children stare in amazement watching his body move mechanically back and forth. One kid says, "He's real!" Another says, "He's fake!" Then both change their minds.

Charlie The Real Dummy. Man or machine?

Grownups make bets, but no one ever wins, because no one ever knows. Charlie has been know to fall down flat, like a board, so the question is: Could a human do this?

Charles Abeziz is the creator of Charlie the Real Dummy. A Sephardi Jew from Toronto he developed Charlie The Real Dummy while on a working holiday in Paris in the mid '80s.

Charlie performed at the Cannes Film Festival in 1989 and the Supergames of 1993 and became a success in Western Europe. Now Abeziz is back in Toronto developing his business for a North American clientele.

"We had a tremendous amount of success in Europe, far exceeding our expectations as a company," Abeziz said. "Now being back in Toronto is refreshing and we are ready to conquer a new market."

Charlie The Real Dummy has recently worked for American Express, Shoppers Drug Mart, Blockbuster video and Rogers Cantel.

So, is Charlie a real person or a wonderful creation? Abeziz won't give away his secret. To try to find out for yourself call 256-4236 or e-mail [www. value network. com/charlie].

At the ROM and The Hockey Hall Of Fame, kids' parties are history

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

In the past few years, children's party entertainment has become more sophisticated. If you aren't up on what's available, your kids will tell you themselves, so keep a step or two ahead of them.

Let Al Solomon at the Hockey Hall of Fame (256-4882) and Connie McDonald at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) (586-5762) clue you in on historic new ideas for kids' parties.

Usually, the word museum still calls up images of ancient objects under glass, solemn guards in uniform and signs commanding Do Not Touch! Also, many of us don't consider an institution like the Hockey Hall of Fame a museum in the same sense as the ROM. Hockey is a contemporary sport, not ancient history.

Museums, however, have changed a lot in the past few decades. The ancient objects and glass cases have not been removed: the purpose of a museum, after all, is to preserve the past. But how? Do we lock the past away and look at it only through a transparent shield? Or do we bring it to life, recreating it as something that was once alive?

Alongside traditional displays, contemporary museums offer ways to fuse education and entertainment, to bring out the "active" in the stock phrase "interactive learning."

The Hall of Fame, for example, is intensive, honing in on one facet of history to show you everything there is to know about hockey. The ROM offers an extensive spectrum through millions of years of human and non-human history.

The ROM offers special birthday entertainment, McDonald says, so that "the museum comes alive."

The party begins with a tour of a choice of galleries, conducted by knowledgeable guides, followed by a craft activity related to the tour. The kids can make anything from a dinosaur to an Egyptian necklace.

Solomon describes the Hockey Hall of Fame as "a fun museum where kids can touch stuff." Entering it is like stepping into an imaginary world.

At any party, logistics can be a challenge, especially when you have to keep your rambunctious youngsters happy, busy and out of trouble. Both ROM and the Hall of Fame meet this challenge by offering, under one roof, entertainment, venue, and that all-important element of every kids' party – food.

The ROM's Birthday Club package includes a birthday cake. Extras include a birthday gift for the guest of honor, and a loot bag for every child guest.

At the Hall of Fame, of course, the kids' eats are hockey-style, the stuff you'd find at a hockey game.

Both museums offer separate adult meals as well.

The Hockey Hall of Fame highlights an important part of Canadian history, namely, our favorite sport. It also promotes values that are integral to sports, like self-discipline, fair play and teamwork. Kids can not only see historic games on film, but can become a team and replay great moments.

Extras offered at the Hall of Fame even include bar mitzvah cakes in the shape of the Stanley Cup, with the child's name on it – the kind of detail that can make a party memorable.

Parents at either the ROM or the Hall of Fame can get involved with the kids or enjoy some activity of their own. Often, they join in with the children. So try something different for your kids' party: something so great that not only they, but you and your adult guests will want to come back.

The rebirth of Klezmer music

Hu-Tsa-Tsa is one of many bands leading a klezmer revival.

Style arose from generations-old folk melodies

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Not long ago, klezmer was a rarity, beloved of a few tradition-conscious musicians and historians, but in peril of dying out. Now it's very much alive again, bands have not only revived the tradition, but are earning a living as professionals.

Klezmer, says Jordan Klapman of Klapman's Klezmer Band (654-0854), is a little like jazz in that it improvises to embellish a melody. Jonno Lightstone of Hu-Tsa-Tsa (651-7521) adds that like jazz, it arose from generations-old folk melodies, often hard to trace in origin, and played at first by musicians without formal training. Also, there is cross-pollination with swing and big band music.

Unlike jazz, though, klezmer stays very close to the melody and avoids star solos. In this, it resembles traditional Celtic music. Its major creative challenge is how elaborately can you embellish or ornament the melody while keeping it clearly audible?

In the early 1900s, as musicians became more sophisticated and better trained, ornamentation became a high art. There are many traditional ornaments, some derived from classical music, but most, like the krechts (a sobbing or sighing sound), are of Jewish origin.

There are what Lightstone calls klezmer dialects. As Romanian musicians came first to America, their style is best known here, but there are many great Hungarians and Russians. The later the musician, the greater the American influence, but the songs are the same. Recording flourished between 1910 and 1929, and New York and Philadelphia were major klezmer centres until the 1940s. Interest faded in the '50s, as most listeners turned to other musical forms.

Many of the musicians also played jazz or were influenced by it. The great Dave Tarras, for example, played in the Romanian style but with big band backing. Ties with the past have never been totally cut. The Epstein Brothers, who enjoyed their heyday in the '60s, are now "retired," but busier than ever; and Shloime Beckerman, who flourished in the '60s, passed his knowledge to his son Sid, who is keeping the tradition alive.

Now you know a little of the history, so how, among the many bands, do you pick the one to play at your joyous event?

Listen to what Klapman and Lightstone have to say and let their ideas and your own tastes guide you in selecting what's right for you and your guests.

Hear a band live, advise both men, to know how well they play and interact with an audience. Talk with a friend, word of mouth can give you the flavor of an event. A tape is third best. It shows if the band is competent, but not whether it has audience rapport. A tape should have not only the same band leader, but the same instruments and players who will be at your simchah.

Klapman and Lightstone see a good party band as one that strikes an even balance between talent and audience rapport. It needs a unique character of its own, and plenty of heart and soul, and love and mastery of the music count for more than fringe benefits such as switching easily to other genres like swing.

Talent, however, should be channeled to please hosts and audience. Some artists disdain the commercial market, so look for a band that enjoys entertaining and responding to people, and holding an audience's attention, but isn't miffed if not everyone listens raptly all the time.

Klapman and Lightstone both attach great importance to being organized, punctual and working well with other entertainers and professionals at an event. Hosts appreciate details like having repertory lists ready to hand. It's also important to dress for the event. Formal wear goes over well, even at an informal occasion.

Make sure the band you choose has a good sound system and makes optimum use of it. It should provide appropriate volume for those who want to hear every note, yet without the loudness that drowns out those who want to talk with other guests.

Decide well ahead of time what kind of band you want and have a good idea how the music should mesh with the rest of your event. Book a year ahead if you can, six months at the latest. Great bands are in great demand and you don't want to miss being able to hire your favorite.

Eureka! Kosher hot dogs

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Two years ago, Isaac and Anat Kraus went to Paramount Canada's Wonderland with their children. On a hot summer day, they had to schlep heavy bags of food around the park because there was no kosher food for sale there.

Anat Kraus sighed and said that it would be nice to visit Wonderland like other people and not have to lug around food.

Then Eureka! She had an idea. Why not set up a kosher concession at the park?

She contacted the park administration to see if she could operate a kosher hot dog stand. It took six months to get an appointment, but in the summer of 1996, the Kosherland (905-882-0085) hot dog cart (COR) debuted at Wonderland.

With their second season behind them, Isaac Kraus said the response to the kosher hot dogs in Wonderland has been very positive.

He said visitors from New York have told him there isn't even a kosher concession at Yankee stadium, and he read from letters sent by other kosher visitors to Wonderland management thanking the park for its sensitivity to the Jewish community.

"People really appreciate the fact that we're there. The cart is an attraction. Many people say they get pleasure just having the hot dog and being able to eat it outside."

As for the kosher kids, they get to be like other kids, Kraus said. "Kids see other kids [buying food]. Now the kids don't have to feel left out."

Kosherland also operates a winter catering business at a number of venues. The company supplies many of the day schools with hot dog lunches on a weekly, bi-weekly or monthly basis, depending on the schools, which include Associated Hebrew Schools, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Ulpanat Orot and Or Chaim, Kraus said.

Kosherland supplies beef – regular and jumbo size – and vegetarian hot dogs and all the trimmings, french fries made without oil, knishes, latkes and drinks, with cotton candy and slushies available on request.

The cart is also available for simchahs, – bar/bat mitzvahs and all kinds of parties, Kraus said. "It's not a heavy meal. We come with all the equipment to the premises. We bring the whole oven with us."

Another company offering kosher meat and pareve foods (COR) for catering and parties is Lazar Yitzchok Meat (416-636-7730). Sylvia Bielak runs the North York company named for her late father.

A product developer, Bielak set up her company, which is a kosher, federally approved manufacturer of kosher food, three years ago.

"We specialize in glatt-kosher beef rib-eyes, first-cut veal chops and racks of lamb. We sell them fresh to the food service industry – hotels and caterers. All these cuts of meat are fresh never frozen," Bielak said.

She stressed that the company is not a store front. Her fresh meat is only available through caterers.

Lazar Yitzchok is also the Canadian distributor of a line of Aaron's Best Glatt Kosher Deli from the United States. "Aaron's makes a unique beautiful smoked turkey breast and the best salami – it's full-bodied and low in fat," Bielak said. She also carries a line of Aaron's hot dogs.

Lazar Yitzchok expanded its premises to adhere to the standards of the Department of Agriculture and the facility is under strict supervision of a mashgiach, who is on the site morning to night.

Bielak said she has developed a new line of frozen prepared hors-d'oeuvres manufactured under the label Masha's Gourmet Food. They are available in many retail outlets. She also provides kosher products to the airlines, a new growth area for her business.

As for her taste testers, Bielak said her focus group is comprised of her niece and nephews, all under the age of 14. She said she develops products with them in mind, so that they can have access to quality kosher fast food.

The Spilly Entertainers focus on interaction with their audience.

Interactive DJs now doing a lot more than spinning discs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

A good disc jockey (DJ) has to have an adaptable personality, says Bruce Citren general manager of North American Entertainment Services (750-3750).

"Some hosts want a quiet, conservative disc jockey. Others want someone loud and flamboyant – a professional DJ can be all those things," says Citren.

DJ services vary, he says, from the basic disc jockey who plays the music and does some hosting, to a package that may include an interactive DJ or emcee who actually gets out on the floor and leads the dances and games.

"The interactive DJ instructs the DJ as to what direction the party should go. He sees what music is getting the crowd up and dancing and what music is not making a hit. He is constantly assessing the crowd. The whole idea of an interactive DJ is that he sets the tone of the party."

Citren's company also offers laser karaoke and a karaoke emcee. "Singers can get up and do any number of songs. A list is handed out and guests fill out a form. We call up the guests and they get up and do their song – often with props. People of all ages love it."

There is much more to being a good DJ, says Citren, then merely playing music. "Most important, he has to know every bit of music the kids know. If kids see a guy who knows what they like, they will respect him – and that could make the whole party.

"I work with a lot of young people from ages 15 to 25 and I see what they react to. Music that kids listen to, often keeps adults in their seats. If a party is made up of adults and young people, I usually play a 50-50 mix of music. That way everyone is happy."

He suggests that when hiring a DJ, clients put the name on a contract so there will be no surprises. "If you're hiring a company and you don't mention a specific name, you don't know who you'll get."

Mark Spillman, president of Spilly Entertainment (905-709-9587), says it is important to hire a company that has strong equipment.

"It has to be powerful enough to be heard in a large room. It is always easier to turn music down rather than turn it up. We offer a complete sound and light system featuring lasers and a smoke machine."

Spillman says he always meets with his clients two to three weeks before the event to discuss the number of guests and what kind of music they like.

"As well, there is always interaction throughout the night. Communication between DJs and hosts is an integral part of the evening. We always have to be assured that things are going exactly as expected."

Games are a favorite part of the evening, Spillman says, and some of his most popular include the Frisbee throw and the Nurf ball throw, in which the winner hits the DJ in the head. "There is always music playing throughout the games."

Another favorite, he says, are the follow-me dances in which one person leads and the others follow, dancing to any step the leader may invent. "Each person leads for about 20 seconds and then we move on to the next leader."

If the bar/bat mitzvah child agrees, DJs will go over a dance, offer an appropriate costume and then have him or her perform it. "The guests just love it," says Spillman.

Decorate with flair and style with Happy Days

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Families planning a simchah may want to visit Happy Days (789-4438 or 905-882-9022), a party store specializing in bar/bat mitzvah decor, gift baskets, and balloon bouquets. The store is located at 248 Steeles Ave. W. in the Toys R Us Plaza in Thornhill.

Happy Days, which is kosher under COR, will soon be celebrating its 10th anniversary. It offers everything for a bar or bat mitzvah party: centrepieces, total room decor, balloons, illuminated name signs, sign-in boards, smash cakes, candy sweet tables, and party machine rentals.

"We do the whole party," says Marsha Winkler, who co-owns the store with her brother-in-law, Richard Winkler. "We offer one stop bar/bat mitzvah party consulting, party machines and decorating."

All centrepieces are custom-designed, Winkler says. "We make a no-obligation sample and work on it until the customer is satisfied. We'll also go with the client to the hall and give a no-obligation quote on the design of the decor."

Popular themes for girls are music and skating

People often come to Happy Days totally confused about what to do, she says. "By the time they leave we give them ideas. We reassure them, and they leave happy."

Happy Days boasts an in-store showroom so people can come to see samples of centerpieces already made up. Popular themes for girls are music, figure skating, ballet and jazz; and for the boys all kinds of team sports, Winkler notes.

Black, gold, silver and teal greens, are popular colors for parties without themes.

"The centrepieces are unique and artistic. We've always been able to come up with creative ideas that our clients really enjoy."

The centrepieces are made of a variety of materials including mylar (shiny paper), glitter, styrofoam, foam core board, plush animals and ribbon, she says. "Our prices are reasonable. We take all budgets into account and accommodate accordingly."

The chocolate smash cakes are very popular, as are the party machines — snow cones, candy floss, popcorn, and mini-donuts — "manned by courteous and friendly staff," Winkler says.

She says the kids' sweet table which is wheeled out at the same time as the adult sweet table includes jellybeans, pretzels chocolate, popcorn, lolly-fizz, lollypops, taffy, jellyfish and other sweets. Kids get bags and fill them with the treats.

Winkler says her clientele loves Happy Days' service. "That's the main thing. We rely a lot on word of mouth business. Our biggest thrill is getting referrals from satisfied customers."

Happy Days, which began as a kosher candy store, was founded by Richard Winkler. A year after its beginning Marsha came to help out.

They began getting a lot of requests for centrepieces and so they offered candy centrepieces and then branched out into total party decor, she says.

Happy Days continues to offer candy and gourmet food baskets and balloon bouquets — they have a delivery service — for all occasions, Winkler adds.

She finds the work she does, "extremely interesting," she says

"It's very fulfilling. Each centrepiece is like a work of art. It's very rewarding from an artistic and aesthetic view."

The Kenny Simon Band.

Bands play an important role

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

The food was great and the decor was original, but what the guests remember most is the fantastic band that had them on their feet all night long.

Kenny Simon, leader and bass guitarist of The Kenny Simon Band (638-2549), says that if hosts are putting so much into their simchah, they should not try and save on one of the most important aspects of the party.

Simon, in business under the Hourglass Orchestra for 26 years before changing to the current name last year, has a guitar player, drummer, saxophonist and keyboard player in his band. He says that a good band with quality equipment can accommodate itself to any size room. "Large bands with a sound person to control the volume can sound good in a large or small room."

Parties are made up of a mix of people, says Simon, and bands must cater to that mix. "Before every party, we meet with the hosts and go through the song list. We try and pick music that will get people of all ages up and dancing. Disco tunes from the '70s are coming back, so both kids and adults like to dance to them."

Simon suggests going out and hearing a band before making a decision. "Look for a tight-knit, well-rehearsed group with quality equipment. Its best to check with the band leader to determine the right time to come. During the main course is not a good time to hear a band.

"Ask around. A band's reputation follows them. Do not listen to too many bands because after hearing nine or 10, you'll forget what you've heard."

A good band, says Simon, works with the party consultant, arrives on time and looks good. "A good leader will discover why people may not be dancing and will change the music. He'll also motivate guests by talking to them or leading them in a dance."

Alan Shiner, president of Nova Sounds Entertainment and leader of Nova Sounds Orchestra (926-1918), advises hiring an established band.

"When you hire a band, you should be guaranteed the musicians you will be getting. It is important, because an established band has a polished sound that you don't get with a group that puts musicians together at the last minute.

"You also want continuity in your music – not a lot of lulls, which often occurs when a band is not rehearsed."

An established band, such as Nova Sounds, also has a fully qualified sound engineer who controls the band's volume from the other side of the room. "We don't guess how we sound. We have all the acoustics in the room on computer, so we know how we should play in particular rooms."

A well-rehearsed band, says Shiner, has all its music memorized. "Our policy is not to have to read music. Spontaneity is impossible if all the musicians are flipping through their music."

A good band leader is constantly assessing the crowd, says Shiner. "He can sense what people want because he is always watching. He tries out songs early in the evening and if they are working, he will stick with that kind of music. I've found that if the crowd doesn't get up and dance until 10 p.m., they'll leave the party earlier. If you do the right thing, at the right time, people get involved."

Other advertising music bands are: Aelita & Friends, 416-222-7573; Fabulous Harvey Seigel Band/All Jazz Band, 416-782-9202; Fern Lindzon Piano & Vocals, 416-445-9780; Magic Touch Orchestra, The, 416-926-0187; Nu-Rhythm Band, 905-882-5044; Paul Zurin Orchestra, The, 905-770-3084; Reflections, 416-661-2415; Russ Myers Band, The, 905-771-0257; Shelley Miller Band, The 416-481-1034; Shelly Ovdat Band, 905-881-9949; Times Square Entertainment Group, 905-881-6400.

Dozens of competing establishments:

Good rapport helps when choosing a caterer

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

By now, everyone has noticed that kosher catering, once a small specialty, has blossomed into an industry with dozens of competing establishments.

If you're planning a simchah, wedding or other special event, this growth offers both a challenge and an opportunity.

While it will be easier to find exactly what you want, you will have to exercise more care in choosing. Moreover, as planning an event grows more complex and demanding, the need to work closely with your caterer grows.

What do Joe Pandolfo of Paradise Banquet (661-6612) and Joe Elmaleh of King Solomon's Table (630-0303), both kosher under COR, say about choosing and working with a caterer?

Elmaleh sums up the requirements in one word – trust. Trust, in turn, is built on rapport. After one or two meetings, you should know if you have the necessary rapport. "If this is in place," Elmaleh says, "all the other factors fall into place."

Though it can be unwise to base business relations on friendships, the reverse can happen. Long-standing business rapport can lead to friendship, sometimes over generations. There are many instances of children using the same caterer as their parents. Along with the many new contenders in the field, there are tried-and-true establishments that have built a reputation over decades.

Both Elmaleh and Pandolfo place value on knowing a company's history. Get referrals from friends and references from the company. Call Congress, too. Seek out a family establishment with its own facilities, which will still be there when your event takes place. While many new caterers are reputable, there are plenty who go under.

Choose an establishment where the owners work as chefs or managers. Good chefs and managers move around, so make sure you deal with the same person from booking date to event date.

Your manager should be available as needed, ready to attend to the details that always crop up – and should leave you with better understanding of catering than before.

Book well ahead, say, a year. Before making your deposit, Pandolfo cautions, find out if it's refundable. A fair deposit ranges from $500 to $1,000. Don't pay in full until one or two days before the event. Get fixed rates in writing, for the day you book, and look for packages that include food, hall, bar, wedding cake, gratuities and DJ. Just getting a price quote that covers all the details can take up to an hour.

Look at the kitchen, to see its size, cleanliness and equipment. Washrooms too are a touchstone for cleanliness. Look also for amenities like parking, bridal suites for a wedding, and in a multi-functional hall, a separate entrance for your function.

For a reputable caterer, offering a sample meal is standard procedure. Make sure you like the menu, portions and taste – and of course, check the wine list. Make sure the maitre d' is good and the waiters are experienced, mature, well-dressed adults.

Along with experience, you want willingness to innovate and adapt. A good caterer taps into different culinary cultures, age groups, special health needs and tastes. This is especially necessary for events like bar mitzvahs and weddings, which span generations.

Your intuitive impression of your caterer also counts, Elmaleh adds, though no decision should be based on it alone. That intangible rapport, which can't be written down, is a must. Like other psychological factors, it's frustratingly hard to define, yet you always know when it's there. It's a blend of mutual tact and mutually compatible temperaments between you and the caterer.

The caterer has to have rapport with other professionals at your event, too. Suppose, for example, that the florist sets up displays without knowing that they don't allow enough table space to serve the food. It's the caterer's task to rectify this tactfully, while giving the florist's art a chance to shine at the same time.

Elmaleh assures you, though, that if rapport exists between you and your caterer, he will work well with the other professionals. Rapport is a two-way street and an ongoing process. You have to work on it just as the caterer does. You have to give him input and listen to what he has to say. If you do work well together, your event is almost guaranteed to be a success.

Other advertising kosher food/caterers are: Levy's Catering, 416-256-7886; Malmar Fine Foods & Catering, 416-638-0091; Prestige Fine Foods, 416-782-3231; Tri Elm-The Sephardic Centre, 416-222-1230; Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers, 905-738-6880.

Choice, convenience & courtesy

Knowing the three 'Cs' of bridal registries

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Today, the range of tableware choices is wider than ever before.

In china alone, there are thousands of patterns. European porcelain and English bone china offer a variety which was not on the market decades ago. There is a comparable range in other tableware and in accessories.

On the one hand, this means there's something in almost any style to meet every taste. On the other, the variety can be overwhelming.

Jackie Chiesa of Ashley's China & Gifts (964-2900) offers many tips to help you select your bridal registry.

To begin with, before you register, have a good idea of your own likes and tastes, and allow plenty of time to make a decision.

Choose a retailer who offers you the widest selection possible — consultants with the expertise and helpfulness to guide you in focusing your selection — and a registry which weds efficient organization with courtesy to the customer.

Your consultant should ask, not only about your tastes in table settings, but also lifestyle and entertainment preferences. How often will you use formal or everyday dishes, for example? How many people will you entertain, and how frequently? How often do you eat in the dining room?

Take into account factors such as how much you use the microwave or dishwasher. Gold and platinum applications withstand dishwasher heat, but not the greater heat of a microwave.

When you first enter the store, you need time to let your impressions settle. When the time comes to firm up your choices, that is when you need expert advice. Your consultant should spend as much time with you as you need.

Pick your china first, as everything else must complement it. Flatware should be chosen next, and then such things as crystal, stemware, serving dishes and teapots. Extras such as service plates to put under the eating plates, and linens and placemats are chosen last.

This is a general guide. Your consultant should be able to help with exceptions. If a bride wants to match new tableware to her grandmother's sterling silver or other heirlooms, tastes and fashions spanning generations must be harmonized.

Don't try too hard to match china with decor. Jackie advises that fine china should stand on its own, as a symbol of your new life.

Remember that you will be living with your tableware for a long time so you will want to balance utility and beauty. Stainless steel flatware, for instance, is maintenance-free, and has a clean, utilitarian appearance; but classic silver flatware looks warmer.

Jackie notices that men today are putting more time and ideas into the selection of tableware. It is no longer the exclusive realm of mother and daughter. It is good for bride and groom to come in together. You will want to enjoy your tableware together for decades.

In choosing a registry, timing and organization are of the essence. Look for regular updating, to keep you informed, and ask to be kept on file for about two years after your wedding. Register at least eight months ahead, as early as a year if you're planning engagement parties or other special events.

Then, Jackie concludes, look for courtesies. Gift boxing is a convenience to every guest; toll-free numbers are helpful to out-of-town guests; gift cards telling you who purchased what, make life easier for you; and postponed delivery after you move to your new home is a convenience for you and your guests alike.

Watching a Bar Mitzvah become a man

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

The young man who walks around our house is somehow different, since he had his bar mitzvah in June.

He stands shorter than me in all the portrait proofs we received, but now he is taller than me. He has matured. His deep brown eyes show more patience, more understanding of his forever underfoot siblings and his nagging "we only want what's best for you" parents.

The memories of his bar mitzvah ceremony flood back to me at various times during the day but mostly when I'm alone: driving, sitting at my computer terminal or doing any number of mundane tasks.

He practised for many months and I began to look forward to the Sunday morning visits of his teacher. The house rang out with the refrain of his parshah. There was some difficulty at first, but then as we approached the big day, his singing showed continuity and self-confidence. He always seemed up to the challenge and never had to be coerced into practising.

He has also been blessed with a day school education, which has given him a good command of the Hebrew language and a deeper understanding of his parshah.

The image of the three generations of men, two grandfathers, our son and his Dad standing on the bimah, is the one that never fades. How fortunate we were to have had healthy grandparents to see their grandson become a man.

During the meal afterwards, I thought about how lucky we truly are in having four grandparents, aunts, uncles, sisters, brothers-in-laws, little cousins and a big collection of old friends and colleagues joining us in our joy.

These images will be with me forever – one room full of life and and warmth, honoring our son and our family. There is no greater feeling. That joy is still with me so many months later and remains a vibrant feeling.

Dear Tony and Peter,

I would very much like to thank you and your staff for the extraordinary job that you did on Sunday, October 26, 1997 for my son Mitchell's Bar Mitzvah party. I would also like to thank Vicky for the exceptional job that she did with the decorations. The room looked great!

The food was amazing and I appreciate your help in creating a menu that worked with the dietary and food allergy restrictions that we had. The staff was on hand all evening and the service was exceptional.

The kids had a wonderful time and the party was just great. I can't think of a single thing that I would change if I were to do it all over again! Hank's Diner is an incredible place for a party and we were just thrilled with everything.

Many thanks to all of you for the excellent service and your contribution towards making my son's Bar Mitzvah party the huge success that it was.

Sincerely yours,

Trudy Burko

Join the Celebration of Stars

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Are there are lot of things you want to know about planning your simchah, but you don't know where to turn? Join the party at Celebration of Stars, March 25 at Adath Israel Synagogue and find everyone you need to talk to under one roof.

The free party show which runs from 6 p.m. to 10 p.m. is a showcase of every type of party professional you may need, from florists to disc jockeys to bridal consultants to caterers.

Marla Kay

Marla Kay, the show's organizer, says Celebration of Stars gives guests an opportunity to speak to several professionals on the same evening.

"Instead of speaking over the phone, people can get personal with the professionals. They can view a videographer's work, look at some sample invitations, see some floral displays – everything they need is all there."

Kay, a party consultant, has put together several party shows and says they have been very successful.

"The first show I did at Beth Emeth was a fashion show highlighting the fashions of Ines Di Santo, a designer and owner of Chez Moi. Before the next show, I invited some professionals involved with weddings and 2,000 guests turned up."

Di Santo's creations are still the highlight of Celebration of Stars and Kay says that most guests plan their evening around the one-hour, full-runway fashion show which begins at 8 p.m.

"As well, bands and disc jockeys put on shows; so prospective clients can hear them without standing in the doorway of another person's party. Caterers also put out displays of their foods and are available to discuss menus. The stars of our industry are all out there showing their stuff and making themselves available to the public," says Kay.

The show is based on the assumption that people do not have the time to run around seeking out several professionals for each service they require, says Kay.

"People know that if they are planning a party, this is where they should turn first. They can find people who fit into their budget, who offer what they want, and who will spend some time talking to them. Bookings are often made right on the spot. Who needs all the aggravation of telephone tag?"

Somehow it doesn't come as a big surprise that Kiddy Chronicles, a baby record book replete with lists, charts and space for mementoes, was written by a chartered accountant.

Dania Lebovics, a 34-year-old Thornhill mother of three young boys, began to chronicle "everything, absolutely everything" when her oldest son Warren, now six, was a newborn.

Frustrated in her search for an existing baby book comprehensive enough to meet her needs, she created her own pages on computer. Once the book began to take shape, friends started asking if they could have a copy.

Soon strangers were calling with requests and Lebovics realized she had a salable product. Undaunted by rejections from 15 publishers, she arranged to have the cover designed and the book bound professionally, and started selling it from her home.

She was particular about having a softcover book with coil binding. "Hardcover is nice, but when you put in pieces of hair, ID bracelets and newspaper articles, the pages start to pull out. I knew I had to do something that would expand."

The fourth edition of Kiddy Chronicles, My Very First Biography: from pre-natal to pre-school, was released in August. The $19.95 book is distributed by Firefly Books Ltd. and can be found in bookstores across North America, as well as in specialty stores in Ontario, Quebec and New York. A French version is in the works.

The non-denominational record book is geared for the period from conception to about age five. A pre-birth section includes a pregnancy weight/blood pressure/stomach measurement chart, checklists for baby's arrival and choosing a pediatrician, and even a page for an ultrasound picture.

A daily schedule, babysitting instructions, medical and dental charts and lots of space for pictures are scattered throughout the 64-page book.

Kiddy Chronicles has evolved as Lebovics received input from other parents. A page for a letter to the baby was one such addition.

Some people think the book is so extensive they won't be able to fill it, she admitted.

"You don't have to fill out everything," she said.

Lebovics keeps her own books for Warren; Zachary, almost 4; and Kenny, almost 2, close at hand to facilitate updates.

When Warren turned five and started asking questions about himself, Lebovics read to him from his baby book and he was fascinated, she recalled. "When I have to think of it myself, I can hardly remember anything."

The record-keeping also paid off when one of the boys had an allergic reaction and she had all his medical information at her fingertips.

"It takes a little effort, but then you can look at it and say, 'I'm so glad I've done it.'"

As one of four siblings growing up in Montreal, Lebovics and her two sisters were "definitely a little bit jealous" that her mother started a baby book for their older brother but didn't do the same for them.

"The novelty shouldn't wear off," maintains Lebovics. "Every child is different.

Lebovics recently received a thank-you card from a mother of four, pregnant with her fifth, signed, "From a mother who keeps everything."

Gogh to the Liss gallery for artsy gifts

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If you're looking for a unique gift for someone special, why not consider an original piece of art.

"You're buying something really meaningful," says art dealer and consultant Brian Liss, owner of Liss Gallery, an art gallery and frame shop at 978 Eglinton Ave. W. (787-9872). He says when you give somebody a gift of art, "you're giving them something that they'll enjoy forever."

A quality piece of art is an excellent gift for weddings and special anniversaries, according to Liss. "A lot of couples come into the gallery to buy an anniversary gift for themselves. It's the perfect gift," he says. "There's a lot of meaning when people buy a piece of art together."

The gallery offers a wide selection of framed original art, original serigraphs and etchings, and limited edition prints and posters. Liss also frames memorabilia such as autographed jerseys and posters of the Maple Leafs and Blue Jays, which he recommends for bar mitzvah gifts.

Gift certificates are available and there's an exchange policy with "no questions asked," he says. He has an approval program: a piece of art can be taken home on approval for up to 48 hours. He also offers an art appraisal service.

Liss provides corporate gifts as well. Corporations will sometimes commission original works of art and do limited editions of the work to be framed and given away as gifts, he says.

Liss represents several Canadian artists, among them Jason Alexander, whose works can be found in 30 galleries across North America.

Liss also represents painter Victor Shvaiko. Originally from eastern Europe and now based in the United States, Shvaiko's scenes of old Europe are extremely popular, Liss says. "We can't keep his work in the gallery it goes so quickly."

The gallery is currently running an exhibition of works by Charles Fazzino, an American artist who does three-dimensional prints with layers of paper. Liss commissioned Fazzino's first Canadian piece, which turned out to be quite the media event, he says. "We had four TV stations on hand when the piece was unveiled for the public."

Liss got into the art business about 15 years ago. He began by selling framed posters, but as his clientele aged and became more affluent, they started asking for original art works, he says.

"I realized that's what I should grow into. You could say my gallery grew up with my clients."

Liss also does art consulting and custom framing for residential and commercial spaces, choosing art for private homes and corporate headquarters. His staff takes care of the installation.

As for buying art, Liss advises people to choose the art for its esthetic value and avoid matching it to a decor. " People buying art for the decor are not buying art, they're buying furniture. They should buy the art they love."

Liss says he considers himself very fortunate to be in the art world. "I'm doing absolutely what I love to do. I'm the luckiest guy in the world."

Quality videos last a lifetime

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

The video of your happy occasion will record an important, unique event in your family history.

You want to eliminate risks in making it, so you should choose your videographer with care, working closely with him to get the best possible product.

But there are many competitors, the technology changes fast, and the quality range is wide. Richard Saunders of Redstone Pictures (256-4666) and Josh Israel of Video by Josh (630-5558) offer sound advice.

Israel recommends speaking to other professionals, such as photographers, before hiring a videographer "but not strangers, or people who pressure you to use specific companies. Also, get references from three videographers you like the most."

Spend time talking to a few videographers, says Saunders, to find one who clicks with you. This person should be the one who edits your video. The second step is a technical matter — finding out how the video will be produced.

Israel places high value on experience, qualifications, familiarity with your type of event, and details such as backup equipment and power sources. Like the videographer, assistants should be capable, dressed for the occasion, and well-mannered.

Israel maintains that medium-sized companies are best. They have high-tech equipment, and treat you well because they have a stake in providing quality.

Big companies, he says, tend to treat you as a number. They rely on volume more than service, and use low-cost equipment to boost profits. Small companies often use low-grade hobbyist's gear, and tend to be part-timers.

Saunders points out, that it is not the editor who shoots your video, so you're really choosing two people. The camera operator needs experience, state-of-the-art equipment and readiness to adapt to your wishes. Check his work, and see a sample tape.

The videographer, says Israel, should be present for your entire event, yet be unobtrusive.

Saunders observes a lot of difference in style between companies, and between clients. Do you want the camera to follow you closely all night? Or do you want it unseen, unheard?

In the last few years, says Saunders, the industry has seen great change. State-of-the-art equipment is costly. Working together, he says, editing and shooting specialists can afford up-to-date technology. Pick a company that divides up the work this way.

Israel, however, prefers having the person who shoots the video also do the editing.

Saunders estimates that $1,350 to $2,000, should get you quality work. Israel says it should cost between $1,000 and $2,000, depending on what you want, and recommends deciding your budget before anything else. Insist on top value for your money, and discounts if any corners are to be cut.

Get the editor to show you his methods, demo tapes and equipment, and get details in writing, they say.

Learn a few technical basics, the videographers advise. Digital recording allows sound and visuals to be edited together on a computer, but it's still in its infant stage.

The old linear tape format is tried and proven — but slower and clumsier, with a lot of splicing and shuffling, as audio and video tapes must be edited separately. Digital tapes are an intermediate stage.

In both old and new technology, degrees of quality vary, whether for tape, cameras, microphones or lighting. One major advantage of up-to-date equipment such as cordless microphones, is that it is easier to keep out of your guests' way.

Capture the important scenes of your event, Israel advises — special effects can be added later. Finally, insist on editing input. After all, the video is yours, and it's yours for good.

Store specializes in clothes for adolescents

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

KidsTreaT (905-771-9906) provides sophisticated, trendy clothing for those who are no longer children, yet not yet women.

"We sell boys and girls sizes up to 16, but we specialize in partywear for that in-between girl, aspiring to be an adult," says owner Michelle Tonken.

Tonken, who recently moved the 10-year-old store to Promenade Mall, said she began carrying preteen and junior sizes when she realized there was a tremendous need in the market.

"Girls were looking for clothes to wear to parties, and they were difficult to find. These girls are not quite mature enough for women's clothes – they need something in between. They are now our base market."

Outfits can be worn year-round

She says that she carries a lot of outfits that can be worn year-round, because "girls go to a lot of parties at that age, and they need versatile items. I sell a lot of materials such as satin and rayon which can be worn during most seasons. I don't recommend heavy wool or 100 percent cotton because they are both seasonal."

Also versatile, says Tonken, is the dress and jacket set. "Instead of wearing the jacket with a skirt, it is worn over a dress. That way the girl has an outfit for shul, and then when she removes the jacket, she has a dress for an evening party. They are quite popular for twilight affairs."

To informal parties girls are wearing a lot of flare pants with short crop tops or body-fitted shirts with collars. "This is the middle-of-the-road look. It can be worn almost anywhere except black-tie parties."

In general, she says, everything today is simple elegance. "Girls are wearing sophisticated adult, but age appropriate clothing. They want to be in women's wear but their bodies and maturity levels are not quite there yet."

Oversize clothing is not as strong anymore, says Tonken. "Girls today want to show their bodies a little more and we sell clothes that can accommodate everyone. Our fit and flare dresses fit through the waist but flare out at the bottom so they make all girls look attractive.

Tonken says when clients walk into her store, she sizes them up immediately so she can show them clothes that are right for them.

"We try and make all girls feel good about themselves. I want them to walk out of our store feeling great. Girls at that age are not yet comfortable with their bodies and we give them all the privacy they want. We make shopping a very positive experience for them."

It is essential, says Tonken, that the girls, not their mothers, pick the outfit. "She is wearing the clothes and she has to be happy. We guide her in the right direction, but she makes the final decision."

Parents love parties where kids can make a big mess

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Samantha Wolfish highly recommends Marvelous Mess (481-2328) for birthday parties. And she should know.

She recently celebrated her eighth birthday with a group of friends at Marvelous Mess, a paint-your-own ceramics cum gift shop at 527 Eglinton Ave. W.

Samantha said she really enjoyed painting with her friends. "Your friends get to pick what they like to make. If you don't know what to do, the people there will give you ideas. My friends thought it was fun. This place is even good for adults. They can have fun there too."

Sherri Wolfish, Samantha's mother echoed her daughter's enthusiasm. The party went extremely smoothly and it was evident that all the children were having a terrific time, Wolfish said.

"They were all very excited by what they were painting. I loved the creative aspect of the birthday."

The children had some 90 items to choose from in her price range and the children were all able to paint something they wanted. Marvelous Mess also supplied drinks, chips and invitations, Wolfish said.

"I felt it was good value. And each piece they painted was the main loot bag item. I just had to supplement it with some candy."

Wynter Rosen, who co-owns Marvelous Mess with Ricki Horowitz, was pleased to hear the positive feedback, because she really wants the children to enjoy themselves, she said.

The children's party package at $15 a child for up to 25 children, includes drinks, snacks and invitations, and a boxed ceramic piece that can be spray painted or kiln glazed.

Samantha Wolfish at Marvelous Mess. [Barbara Silverstein photo]

Adult parties, which are popular for showers and birthdays, cost $13.50 a person for groups of 10 or more. Adults usually bring their own food. Rosen advises people to book their parties two months in advance to get the times they want.

Marvelous Mess draws many people who enjoy coming to the studio as a hobby, she said. "It's very relaxing. People work hard and want to try different things."

Marvelous Mess also specializes in "unique funky Judaica" and personalized giftware, Rosen said. "The personalizing and customizing and the Judaica are the mainstay of the business... Judaica is huge for us. We're growing rapidly in the States."

The Chanukah menorahs are the most popular gifts, Rosen said. "We have some great new patterns. They're popular gifts for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs and anniversaries. You can get matching kiddush cups, seder and matzah plates. Young Jewish couples want bright colorful Judaica. Our pieces all have a happy feel."

Marvelous Mess also offers personalized baby gifts which include pictures frames, tzedakah boxes, and personalized plates, she said.

"We can make the perfect gift for any occasion."

The store's Web site which will soon be up and running, will enable people to paint their own designs. Marvelous Mess will then transfer them to the ceramic pieces, she said.

The place is also available for new artists because, as an artist herself, Rosen is well aware of how difficult it is for young artists to get exposure, she said. "We're taking on lots of consignment work."

Marvelous Mess is the ideal business for her, said Rosen, a singer-song writer, artist and single mother. "It's difficult to make a living out of doing art. I have always been creative, doing oil paintings and large murals. I wanted to do something creative for a living."

On a trip out West last winter she saw a do-it-yourself ceramic store and realized that was the perfect business for her. "I loved it. I said, 'This is what I want to do.'"

Two weeks after returning to Toronto, Rosen met Michele Dodick (of Dodick Designs), who was selling her Eglinton Avenue ceramic gift studio.

"I went and saw her store," Rosen said. "I felt like it was meant to be and I bought her business."

Rosen, who has been running the studio since April, said she has continued to carry Dodick's line of customized Judaica and other giftware, bringing in new artists with new designs. She also added a do it yourself studio for hobbyists and parties, as well as a kids' party room.

Down the road, she envisions hiring a jazz band, adding a patio and holding parties for singles.

Rosen also has artists on staff who help clients with their creations if they need support, she said.

"I want people to feel proud of the pieces they create so they'll walk out of the store and say, wow!"

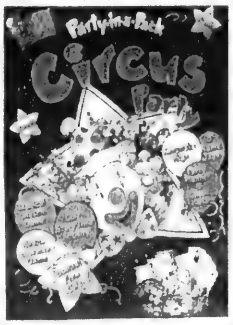
Prof really a Party-Wiz

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Joanne Gray, the founder of Party-Wiz Productions Ltd., (905-709-2685) always prided herself on making great home birthday parties for her three sons.



The part-time professor – she teaches a business course at York University – would always hold birthday parties centred around themes such as animals, pirates or the circus.

Theme-based games and activities give the children an opportunity to use their imagination, she says. "The kids love pretending. The theme allows you to play in a way you don't really get a chance to play very often."

Her friends always praised her efforts, telling her the parties were better than the ones held in party centres outside the home, says Gray. The positive response from parents encouraged her to develop Party-in-a-Pack, a year and a half ago.

She describes the pack, which is geared to children aged three to seven, as a "user-friendly package" for parents or organizers of home-birthday parties.

Each pack retails for $13.50 and includes two interactive games and an activity related to the theme, name tags for eight children, party and menu planner, shopping guide and check lists, as well as a memento page and a free gift for the birthday child.

Gray says she came up with the package because "there is nothing like this out there in the market."

Developing this product came naturally, she says, because she comes from a game-playing family.

"We are all games players. We were on quiz shows and TV game shows. I even met my husband [Jeff Gray] through a TV game show."

Once she developed the idea, she turned to artist Andrea Beck to illustrate the packages. Gray says she then put on her "marketing hat," which is not much of a stretch since she holds an MBA.

She has been successful in selling her party packages to retail outlets in Canada and the United States. Party-in-a-Pack in Canada can be found at Leisure World, Chapters Inc., and crafts and hobby, book and independent toy stores.

The perfect schmoozing smile

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

Image is definitely our first means of communication – especially at parties – and white teeth speak volumes.

The Smile Salon is based on a unique concept dedicated to the most sophisticated, state of the art technology and products. The amazing results will definitely give you something to smile about.

Tooth whitening is actually a bleaching process that lightens discoloration of enamel and dentin. The Laser White Smile whitening system is one of the world's quickest, easiest and most effective way to safely whiten teeth. Now through the use of FDA approved laser technology, it is possible to achieve whitening results previously thought unattainable.

Incredibly accurate wavelengths of blue laser light work on special gels applied to the teeth. The solutions employed are really nothing new to dentistry and have been used for many years.

Penny Freedom, a registered dental hygienist, has taken beauty treatments out of the dental office into a sophisticated, relaxed environment. At the Smile Salon, 1235 Bay St., she has installed the world's most effective technology to provide the finest service and results. The use of laser light to accelerate tooth whitening gels allow her to offer this service in one visit as opposed to home applications of gels that usually require up to one month's commitment.

The procedure takes two to three hours following an initial consultation where impressions are taken for the fabrication of custom-made trays. They are used two to three days following the laser whitening appointment. The laser does not affect the structure of the tooth at all, it acts on the gel to release oxygen, which causes the teeth to whiten.

There is no pain and it's amazing that in a couple of hours, such incredible results can be achieved. The whitening process is most effective on mildly discolored teeth, darker stains such as those caused by antibiotics, take longer to respond to treatment, but the results are still excellent. However, the degree of whiteness will vary. Laser White can brighten your smile up to 15 shades whiter.

Kloda provides a new kind of fun

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Kloda (905-763-9000), the mega-entertainment company that started in Montreal in 1977, is finally open for business in Ontario.

Evan Aranoff, president of Kloda Productions Ontario, says that Kloda specializes in a different kind of fun.

"Besides disc jockeys, we offer special-effect lighting, inflatable games, virtual reality games or even a casino. When people hire us, they can choose an entire entertainment package or just have a disc jockey come out to their party. We can provide as little or as large a package as our clients desire."

Aranoff, who started with Kloda seven years ago as a disc jockey, says that no matter how simple or how elaborate a party is, Kloda always makes it special.

"Our disc jockeys truly make the party. They develop a rapport with the crowd and do their best to turn everyone into party animals. The disc jockeys are constantly reading the audience and assessing its mood, in order to play exactly what music is best for the moment."

At a party where guests vary greatly in age, Aranoff says, they play a mix of music that pleases everyone.

"We play a lot of games, because everyone likes to watch others playing and we also go out into the audience and entice people to get up and dance. We use a lot of props such as wigs, funny hats, costumes and often dress up the guests. By the end of the night, everyone has a shaker or party prop and each person from youngest to oldest is inevitably in the party mood."

The disc jockeys also help coordinate the event, he says, by ensuring that everything, from the meal to the speeches flows smoothly.

"We're happy to work with wedding consultants to ensure that things are going well. We want our clients to be a guest at their own party, so we try and take as much out of their hands as possible."

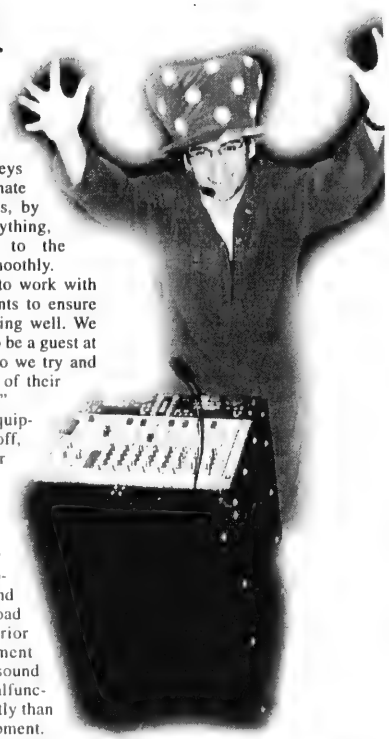
Professional equipment, says Aranoff, is essential for good sound. "There is a tremendous difference in quality and reliability between true professional-grade and middle of the road equipment. Inferior quality equipment causes a harsh sound and tends to malfunction more frequently than professional equipment.

"Kloda uses only concert-quality, heavy duty equipment. The result is a better, not a louder sound."

Even the best equipment occasionally malfunctions, he says, and "we always send backup equipment so that on the remote chance that something happens, there is virtually no music interruption at the event. Because we own all our equipment, there is no mark-up because of rentals. It saves clients money and it gives them a wealth of equipment from which to choose."

He suggests that prospective clients view Kloda's video, which highlights a number of the company's parties. When people come to see us, we go over every detail of the party. We help them choose music for the dancing, for the candlelighting and for the dinner. Every event, no matter what the budget, needs to be handled by a professional and we tailor every party to meet specific requirements.

"We are well known for putting together a great party. People are mesmerized by our hi-tech lighting and concert-quality sound. Any disc jockey can make music. Our disc jockeys make the party."



Evan Aranoff conjurs entertainment.

PARTY PLANNER

'J'accuse!'

One of your dinner guests killed? No problem. Call the professionals

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Did you ever have one of those parties where one of your dinner guests was murdered?

Hopefully not. But wouldn't it be fun if there was a "pretend" murder and you and your guests got to work "your little grey cells" and figure out who the murderer is? "J'accuse!"

If your mind thrives on challenge and drama, you'd want to hear more. And a good look at Dani Holden and Isabel Hornstein's Ho Ho Entertainment (484-6873) would make you want to know more yet.

Ho Ho offers something unique for a party: a mystery play, usually a murder mystery, accompanied by a dinner. The plays work best in a sitting-down situation, like a private room in a restaurant. It is also best if everyone is at one table, to make it easy to establish a focal point for the action.

Ho Ho supplies the props and actors who play detectives, criminals and their assistants – you and your guests, besides trying to solve the mystery, can also act in it. Of course, there's a clue to "whodunit" and a prize for whoever figures it out. Guests can have fun exercising their minds, or if they prefer, just sit back and watch.

Your guests will know in advance that there's a mystery, but they may not realize that the actors are anything but guests they've never met or gatecrashers who never got kicked out. Today, when any clothing style is "in", you might not see anything remarkable in, say, a woman in a feather boa.

(Most shows avoid famous sleuths like Sherlock Holmes with his trademark hat and pipe. However, Ho Ho has done a play with characters who were relatives of famous detectives.)

Writers allow plenty of room to improvise

Each show is custom-written to suit the client, but even you won't know the culprit in advance. Before they start writing, the script writers brainstorm with you, but don't give away the ending. They tell you just enough to entice you to find out more, the way you describe a movie to a friend without telling too much.

Musical and cabaret venues are possible, and corporate events can have a relevant theme like industrial spying. The script writers make an outline, allowing plenty of room to improvise. Actors are chosen for their ability to do this and there's usually lots of humor.

Children's shows are possible too. These plays appeal to all ages, but if you're looking for ways to show your kids that thinking can be fun, a mystery may be what you need.

The props are not elaborate. Realistic as hi-tech special effects are, they challenge the imagination less than live theatre, because they give you the imaginary world in one piece, rather than motivating you to create it.

In live theatre, part of you is always aware that you are sitting in the dark, among rows of real-world seats with other playgoers. Consequently, your mind has to work hard to envision the imaginary world of the play. In live theatre, you yourself put the "creation" into "recreation."

Moreover, this form of entertainment is interactive. Guests and hosts are truly part of the show. In this way, Ho Ho breaks down what Isabel Hornstein calls "the fourth wall."

This figure of speech means that in conventional theatre, the audience is surrounded by four walls – the three, literal back and side walls and the fourth, figurative wall, the invisible psychological barrier between stage and audience. When you participate in the play, with some initiative in your role, that barrier falls.

Book at least two to three weeks ahead, to allow writing time. Creating a good script that leaves room for improvisation is fun, but it's also work. If the idea of a mystery play appeals to you, you want only the best.

Delectable recipes for all occasions

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Cookbooks do not merely adorn a kitchen; they elevate it into a temple of fine cuisine. The following cookbooks, published recently, will be appreciated by gastronomes and amateurs alike.

Ethel Hofman grew up in the only Jewish family in the windswept Shetland islands, north of Scotland. But the remoteness of her upbringing had no adverse effect on her fondness for good old-fashioned Jewish food.

This is abundantly clear in her eclectic book, Everyday Cooking for the Jewish Home (HarperCollins), which contains more than 350 easy-to-follow recipes and reflects Ashkenazic and Sephardic influences.

Hofman, a food writer based in Philadelphia, covers all the bases, from appetizers and soups to meats and desserts. She is to be congratulated on her thoroughness.

Joan Nathan is a legendary figure in culinary circles, having written two of the most distinguished books of the genre, The Jewish Holiday Kitchen and Jewish Cooking in America.

Now she's back again with The Jewish Holiday Baker (Random House), an intriguing compendium which distils the art of Jewish baking.

Nathan has scoured the globe for mouth-watering baked goods associated with major Jewish holidays, and she does not fall short: crusty challahs from Jerusalem, onion buns from Paris, bagels from Montreal, prune and nut rolls from London, chocolate babkas from Oak Park, Michigan, and banana cakes from Mexico City, among other treats.

Mmmm good.

Women, having joined the work force, have less time than ever to prepare the weekday evening meal. What's for Dinner (Raincoast Books), by Maryana Vollstedt, is tailor-made for the harried cook who expects stellar results without too much fuss or bother.

The busy career woman will take to this book like a bear to honey.

The majority of Jews in Canada are descended from East European immigrants. A Little Russian Cookbook (Raincoast Books), therefore, is likely to strike a note of familiarity.

Many of the recipes in this attractive pocket-sized volume are like old, reliable friends: borscht, mushroom soup, braised carrots, curd cheese pudding, cutlets and the like.

This is a book grandma might have liked.

We live in an age when the consumption of meat is increasingly frowned upon. Vegetarians, in particular, will enjoy Vegetarian 30 Minute Indian Cookbook and Vegetarian 30 Minute Thai Cookbook, both of which are published by HarperCollins.

The first, by Mridula Baljekar, disproves the old saw that Indian dishes are complicated and time-consuming.

The second, by Sarah Beattie, proves that a willingness to learn, a bit of flexibility and the right fresh ingredients can work magic in a pan.

Complementing these books is Heather Thomas' The New Vegetarian Cookbook (HarperCollins), which is not only practical but beautiful to look at. The recipes here, ranging from vegetable lasagne to moussaka, will suit every taste, occasion, season and budget.

A triumph of editing and esthetics.

Olive oil, the divine elixir of the Mediterranean basin, has become a beloved staple throughout the universe. In Olive Oil: From Tree to Table (Raincoast Books), Peggy Knickerbocker traces the birth of this aromatic cooking oil, explains how it is harvested and processed and provides countless and creative ways for using it in the kitchen.

Olive Oil, which definitely qualifies as a coffeetable book, is lavishly illustrated with razor-sharp photographs taken by Laurie Smith.

No meal would be complete without a refreshing drink. In this respect, Smoothies (Raincoast Books) is just the book for you, brimming over with bright suggestions for whipping up mixtures of fruits, sorbets, yogurts, soy milks and so on.

The ideal thirst-quencher.

Agendas help with party planning

By RICK LEVINE
Special to The CJN

With your party fast approaching, you may begin to have anxiety attacks. In all likelihood, everything will go just fine, but it never hurts to carry a little insurance in the form of a professional, well thought out agenda to keep the party on track.

The agenda is the sequence of events or the program for the evening and it is not uncommon for people planning their very first simchah to be completely in the dark as to when the speeches will take place or when the bride and groom will have their first dance.

Although nothing is written in stone, reviewing the following program suggestions will shed some light on the proper sequence of events, and replace pre-party anxiety with post party pleasure. Photocopy these wedding/bar/bat mitzvah agendas and fill in the blanks or make changes to suit your particular needs.

A few elements are worth reviewing and will be of particular interest.

At a wedding, the father of the bride (and occasionally the father of the groom) will speak prior to the reciting of the Hamotzi, in order to briefly share sentiments and to welcome the guests. The toasts and the groom's speech will be heard after the meal; the groom's speech will be the final word and will be followed by cutting of the cake and then the bride and groom's first dance.

It will be much the same format at a bar/bat mitzvah, with the father of the guest of honor (GOH) welcoming the friends and relatives before the Hamotzi and the GOH's speech being given after the meal.

Candlelighting, which will be a scheduled event at most bar/bat mitzvahs, usually takes place after dinner, but can also be scheduled at the beginning of the evening if the hosts wish. The decision for the timing of the candlelighting will depend on a number of considerations, including the starting time of the event. For example, in a synagogue on Saturday evening, the festivities cannot start until after sundown; therefore, it may be necessary to keep the candlelighting in the after dinner spot, in order to be able to serve the meal at a reasonable hour.

The Birkat Hamazon (Benching) takes place after the dessert is served. The question is whether or not to schedule these prayers before the speeches or after. Experience has shown that, at a wedding for example, rather than following the first dance with the Sheva Brachot, it is better to have the prayers first, then the speeches, followed by the cake cutting and the first dance. This will allow the dance floor to fill more quickly and the party to run smoothly without interruption.

It would therefore make sense at a bar/bat mitzvah to have the prayers take place before candlelighting, complete the candlelighting.

Above and Beyond a party alternative

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The newly opened Above and Beyond, the Centre for Adventurous Learning (633-4584) is an unusual venue for a party.

Located at 4100 Chesswood Dr. in North York, the huge adventure space – the room is 136 feet by 60 feet – is a corporate training centre that doubles as a party centre.

Above and Beyond simulates outdoor activities, offering ropes and climbing events indoors. The equipment is removed for parties, which take place in a room that has the feel of the outdoors complete with twinkling stars, a lake and a mural of the forest stretching across all four walls.

Above and Beyond is connected with DJs and caterers, and offers a unique venue for any simchah, said co-owner Andrew Levison.

"We provide an alternative to the more traditional party places."

Above and Beyond is the brainchild of Levison, an urban planner, corporate trainer and wilderness expert. Having spent a number of years working in wilderness corporate training programs for team building, Levison said, he recognized the need for a similar program to be carried out indoors in cities, within easy access of corporate offices. "People can come here for the day."

Such a training centre could save companies the expense of sending their employees to out of town wilderness training programs, he said, because Above and Beyond offers indoor expeditions which accomplish the same purpose. "We provide people with a personal and professional development tool."

When he did a marketing research of the project four years ago, he approached the bank about using the service. Not only did the bank want to sign on as a client, but it offered to lend money for the centre, Levison said. He was delayed in setting up because he could not find the kind of space he wanted.

While the equipment is geared to corporate use, he said, the obstacle course, climbing gear and rock climbing wall could be suitable for teenagers and adults looking for an unusual and different type of experience or party.

When he was an urban planner, Levison worked on unique urban environments such as Wonderland. And being a nature enthusiast, he was always looking to create an indoor environment that would replicate the outdoors. He said that with Above and Beyond he has finally succeeded in bringing the wildness environment to an urban setting.

Chairman Mills rents kosher dishes

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Expecting extra company for dinner? Or perhaps you're throwing an intimate party for 5,000 of your closest friends.

Whatever the size of your bash, Chair-man Mills (391-0400), a party rental company, can provide chairs, dishes, silverware, tables and table clothes for up to 5,000 people.

Vice-president Mary Crothers, whose husband George recently became head of the company, said that Chair-man Mills, was established by the Mills family back in 1911.

"Our main thrust is to make an old established company even better by adding new inventory and updating the operation," she said.

The company recently introduced a line of kosher (COR) dishes and cutlery, which is inspected regularly by a mashgiach; she also works closely with certain kosher caterers, she added.

Chair-man Mills prides itself on providing quality rentals with superior service; its trucks run 24 hours a day picking up equipment at all hours to accommodate clients, Crothers said.

"We offer top of the line quality items at competitive prices. We have experienced, professional staff, who know how to set up. Our drivers are conscientious. They don't track dirt into the house."

She noted that Chair-man Mills has the contract for major events such as the Royal Winter Fair, Tennis Canada and the Molson Indy – it does all the draping, staging and carpeting. It also has contracts with several party venues, including The Royal Ontario Museum, Roy Thompson Hall and the Hockey Hall of Fame.

The company, which offers dinner service from basic dinnerware to fine bone china, does all the dish washing after the party, she said.

"It's so easy. You just put everything back in the boxes. We take care of everything else."

Chair-man Mills also has access to a wide assortment of table linen "from basic polyesters to beautiful brocades," and there's also a large assortment of chairs, which cost from $1.25 for a folding plastic chair to $8 for a gold ballroom chair with a fabric seat, she said.

The company also supplies miscellaneous party items such as trays, ice buckets, coffee urns, samovars, baskets and candlesticks.

Crothers said the public is welcome to visit the showroom six days a week at 184 Railside Ave., just south of Lawrence Avenue, one block east of the Don Valley Parkway.

She said she has been involved with a lot of fundraisers and has a background in fine-tuning parties and functions and really enjoys her work at Chair-man Mills. "I'm hooked. I always loved doing parties. It's our wish to make a great company tops."

An invitation from Mandell

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Corey Mandell, possibly the most popular DJ on the bar/bat mitzvah circuit, will be hosting his own party early in the new year and the public is invited.

The Richmond Hill-based Mandell Entertainment Group (905-886-4000) will be holding its first open house on Jan. 20, from 7 to 9:30 p.m., at Le Parc, at the south-west corner of Leslie Street and Highway 7.

"It's a chance to demonstrate everything the consumer needs to see to plan the perfect party," Mandell says. "We're trying to hold the ultimate event so people can see everything at once."

He says all his DJs will be performing and the party decor will all be on display. "It's the best way for the public to see what Mandell Entertainment has to offer."

There will be fun foods, lighting demonstrations, indoor fireworks, interactive games and the "hottest and newest party novelties and give-aways," Mandell says. "It's a party, not a trade show. Be prepared to party."

The open house is especially useful for anyone planning a bar or bat mitzvah in the next three years, he says.

Mandell Entertainment was founded by Mandell six years ago. He began with seven DJs. Today there are 100 full- and part-time employees on his roster, which includes DJs, dancers, decorators, consultants and administrative staff.

The company offers party planning services, decor and theme planning, balloons, centrepieces, flowers, technical entertainment (karoake, video and laser shows), pyrotechnics (indoor fireworks), lighting, interactive games, as well as fun machine rentals for candy floss, popcorn and mini-donuts.

Mandell says he does more bar and bat mitzvahs than any other DJ in the area and he is often booked well over a year in advance; his more popular DJs are also in high demand.

Corey Mandell. [Barbara Silverstein photo]

He attributes his company's popularity to the fact that he and his DJs put on a show – they interact with the guests. They work the crowd, schmoozing, telling jokes and organizing activities like line dancing and limbo. "Our DJs put entertainment first," he says.

Mandell says that many other DJ companies have emulated his interactive style as well as other entertainment innovations. "Our company sets a precedence for DJ trends. When I first hired dancers, everyone thought it was crazy. Now everyone has dancers."

The dancers help get the crowd onto the floor, he notes.

Four years ago, Mandell teamed up with independent party decorator Renee Birnbaum, now theme party coordinator and head of the decoration division. The partnership has been so fruitful that the decor division is about to open a new 3,000-square-foot showroom.

Other new developments for Mandell Entertainment include a stronger communication and administrative team and a new in-house party consultant service. Mandell stresses that this service is not intended to compete with independent party consultants.

In January, he will be introducing a new lighting system from the United States, which he describes as "the Porsche" of the lighting industry.

"We will be the only ones in Canada to have it," he says. "We've got an early purchase on it."

This past summer he launched an interactive Web site [www.mandelldj.com] for bar and bat mitzvah planning. So far the site has had 10,000 hits, he says.

"We get 200 to 300 questions a week. We try to answer every one. We're the only DJ interactive Web site.

"The music never changes," Mandell says. "It's how you play it that counts. In this business you always need new and creative ideas."

Discount deals at Tom's Place

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Fifteen years ago Tom Mahailik bought his father's second-hand clothing business. Located in a tiny 400 square-footstore front in Kensington Market, the business opened in 1958, shortly after the family arrived form Hungary.

The business that grew out of his father's store is now called Tom's Place, (416-596-0297) a designer discount store which offers brand-name merchandise at reasonable prices.

The store, located at 190 Baldwin St., is still in Kensington Market, but it occupies a space more than 20 times the size of the original location. Today there are 28 full-time and 10 part- time employees, among them sale clerks, seamstresses, tailor and fabric buyers.

"Per square foot I sell more menswear then any one else in the city,"Mahailik said. The company has its own label, he explained.

"We offer read-to-wear suits made of cloth from the finest mills in the world says. We sell a lot of suits. That's the mainstay of our business."

He said this year there is more wool- 100 percent wool suits are very common. "Brown is very important as the main color."

And while the store sells men's and women's clothing, menswear is the bulk of the business, Mahailik said. Tom's Place boasts a large assortment of shirts, ties and other accessories.

Bright-colored shirts- deep blue, grey and greens are teamed with solid color wider ties, Mahailik said.

Jacket lapels have stayed narrow, he noted. "The emphasis is on trimmer and tailored clothing instead of wide-bodied garments."

This winter look for cashmere sweaters worn under sports-jackets, three- button long sleeve polo shirts and mock turtle necks; as for casual Fridays, cotton and corduroy in deep green, olive, andnavy blue, are very popular, he said.

For women, Mahailik said tailored pants suits, long cashmere coats accented by powder blue, pumpkin and brown are important; skirts are worn short or just above the ankle.

Back by popular demand, Tom's Place will be holding a sale at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) on Nov. 29 and 30. A percentage of the proceeds will go to the JCC.

with a horah and continue with the dancing.

Talk to the band leader, in order to have the band schedule its breaks around your formalities. If the band takes breaks at speech time, the music will provide continuous entertainment without additional costs.

If there is one single factor that can maximize the chance for a successful simchah, it is a well organized agenda. If the caterer, the entertainers and the speechmakers know in advance what they are doing and when they are supposed to do it, you will be able to enjoy yourself as a guest at your own party. Many years of fond memories will follow a well organized event.

Interactive entertainment keeps spotlight on the guest of honor

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Entertainers from Kaboom.

These days, the word "interactive" is on everyone's lips, but what exactly does it mean?

Here's how Bill Greenbaum of Kaboom (483-6811) and Rick Levine of Times Square Entertainment (905-881-6400) explain it.

Levine describes the basic elements that make an event memorable: good music, personable, energetic entertainers (DJs and emcees) and competent assistants. Audience participation works best when integrated with solid professional entertainment.

In Levine's experience, live singers with digital background are fine for most adults, but many young people want more activity.

Keeping kids happy singing songs and playing games takes a lot of worry off parents — and gives them time to finish their dinner at a leisurely pace. Levine also considers interactive entertainment a way to keep the spotlight on the guests of honor.

If Greenbaum were booking interactive entertainment for himself, the venue would be a major factor. As you increase the dollars spent, the spectacle and consequently the venue becomes more important. How big is the stage, and what shape? How many doors are there and where? How high is the ceiling?

Greenbaum identifies several levels of interaction. The first, impromptu repartee among guests and entertainers, is common. At the next level, the DJ involves guests in the action, dancing with them on stage, for example, or getting them to take part in a contest. At the third level, some of the audience play the roles of characters in a production, say, the Four Tops.

At the next stage, everyone is involved. The room is the Palace Theatre in Motown – the whole audience is with the Four Tops, recreating another world, in roles ranging from extras to stars. The sky's the limit. Production values can be raised indefinitely by bringing in actors and enhancing decor, lighting and technical support. A company that offers this interactive level can create whatever you want.

A company that does everything in-house, Greenbaum believes, makes consistent high production values more likely for any entertainment package. It's easier to manage logistics, and coordinate costumes, props, flowers and all the other details. Levine agrees with this point.

Make sure, if your party has a theme, that it's supported in every facet of production and that your entertainment planner is an all-round person who knows the lingo of all the varied professionals he works with. Look also for someone well-versed in many kinds of events, corporate as well as private.

Someone who "thinks outside the lines," Greenbaum thinks, will be able to impart something new to your event, or put a new twist on something old — say, holding a pool party at the bottom of an empty pool, or a "February blues" party in a blues club. Why should your event be the same as anyone else's?

Greenbaum attaches great importance to corporate experience, in teaching the discipline of a strict budget and timetable. The cost, he estimates, can run from $5,000 to $15,000 and up, depending on what you want. Levine, for his part, counsels budget flexibility.

For lower cost and fewer problems with bureaucracy, Levine puts local entertainment above out-of-town or out-of-country. He knows of cases where plans have been thrown awry because American performers were stopped at the border without work permits.

Levine also says you should familiarize yourself with the interactive entertainment field well in advance, about 18 months ahead. For a bar or bat mitzvah, book about a year before the event. Book three to four months ahead, Greenbaum advises, and keep in touch thereafter.

The bigger and more interactive the event, the more consultation and dialogue is needed. No matter how complex the technology, no matter how elaborate the spectacle, rapport between client and professional is as important today as it always was.

Invitations reflect personal statement of party's hosts

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Invitations give people a feeling for the event to which they've been invited says Heather Hennick, owner of Henco Consulting Inc. (905-881-5736).

"When invited guests open an invitation, they get an impression of what is taking place. Invitations can be bright and upbeat, formal or simple and elegant. However they are presented, they reflect the personal statement of the hosts," says Hennick, a certified graphic designer, visual artist and illustrator.

Invitations from Henco Consulting Inc.

Hennick, who custom-designs invitations, uses a variety of papers to produce full-color printing designs, which often incorporate the theme of the party.

"I can do an illustration or my clients can supply me with an illustration or photograph. We can borrow ideas from other invitations and use some of our own ideas. I use state of the art computer equipment as a means of design."

Rather than following particular trends, she says, her invitations are unique because all work is done in her studio. "I carry paper in stock and use many types of printing methods from embossing to foil stamping. Only our imagination is our limit."

Hennick also offers sign-in posters to tie in with the invitations. "The posters, which start at $200, could incorporate the theme of the party. A ski theme, for example, could have a neon-bordered poster which features the graphics of a skier upon which is placed the bar mitzvah boy's face. I love it when people allow me to express my creativity."

She says that although invitations can be ordered as close as three weeks before the event, she is most comfortable with having three months to ensure that the invitation is perfect.

"I want my clients to have time to check everything before they take the invitations home."

Ann Feldman, owner of The Printed Word (484-4600), says that deciding when to send out an invitation is dictated by what time of year the simchah falls.

"You have to give people enough notice to plan for the event. People make summer vacation plans early, so if you're having a late spring or summer simchah, you may want to send out the invitations at least eight weeks in advance. February or March, however, are slower months; so people are less apt to be busy. Six weeks is usually enough time that time of year."

It is also wise, she says, not to send out invitations in time to arrive during Jewish holidays such as Rosh Hashanah or Passover. "Have them come before or after the holidays, when people have time to appreciate them."

People on a strict budget need not worry says Feldman, because "there are many different options in all price ranges.

"People place a restriction on the amount they want to spend on their invitations for various reasons and we respect them. Whatever the budget, we can produce elegant invitations that speak to the event."

She agrees that there are no real trends in invitations. "They are a function of personal taste. Some people like bright and upbeat, others prefer understated and formal. Invitations give guests an inkling of what to expect before they even read the words.

"If they open a silky off-white card bordered in gold, they know it isn't an informal children's party to which they've been invited. On the other hand, if a guest receives a brightly colored invitation with a sports theme, do they need to read it to know they've been invited to a bar mitzvah?"

Personalized ketubot

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Toronto-based ketubah artist Claire Ciss (784-1426) creates personalized ketu-bot that are completely done by hand. Every design is original and hand-done, on acid-free paper in gouache, a versatile type of water color.

Couples interested in purchasing one of her ketubot, which start at $500, can book a visit to her studio to view her portfolio.

The Chicago-born artist started out as an elementary school educator, but she was always drawn to art. After seeing a hand-painted ketubah at a friend's wedding in 1973, Ciss said, she found her calling.

"When I saw this idea of joining Judaism and art together, it really clicked. I said, 'This is what I want to do. This is me…' I felt I had something to express. I had a need to express myself visually and I was becoming more spiritually involved in Judaism."

She said she travelled to New York, where ketubah artists Jay Greenspan and David Moss were based. She attributes the revival of the ketubah as an art form in the late '60s to Greenspan and Moss who were rabbinic students at the time.

"They decided to bring back the idea of hand-crafted ketubot, which had been dormant for many centuries. It was not an art form that was current," Ciss said.

She approached Greenspan about learning this art form. "He showed me the basics. He taught me the calligraphy. It was a labor of love to get it to flow."

In 1977 she gave up teaching elementary school and enrolled at the School of Visual Arts in New York City where she studied calligraphy, illustration, graphic design and photo retouching.

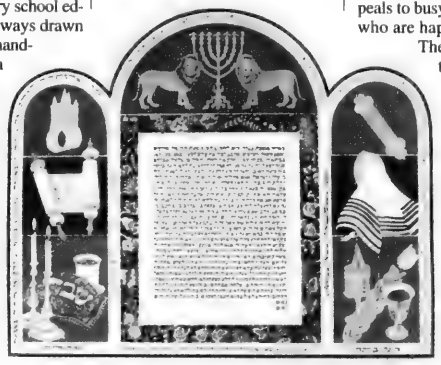
She worked in a photo-retouching studio doing advertising work while running a ketubah art business on the side.

After seven years, Ciss had become quite well-known in the field of ketubah art and decided to become a full-time ketubah artist, she said. "It gave me a tremendous satisfaction to create art in a Jewish format."

When she married Torontonian Julius Ciss, she relocated her studio to Toronto.

Ciss said her motifs, which have appeared on UJA Federation certificates, run the gamut from modern to antique looking. Some of her most popular designs include persian and floral prints, as well as chassidic dancers and scenes of Jerusalem. Also very much in demand is her personalized chupah scene which she paints from photographs of the wedding party as if it were the wedding day, she said. "People love it."

She said she is one of the first generation of ketubah artists, but now there are many talented artists doing ketubot with their own styles.



Many of those artists are represented by the company Ketubah Ketubah, operated by Michael Shapiro (924-6997). Shapiro, who has an MBA in marketing worked for the corporate giant Procter & Gamble before venturing out on his own. The corporate work was a great training ground for learning business strategy, he said.

And while he knew he wanted to run his own business in a creative field he didn't really know what he wanted to do.

After leaving Proctor and Gamble for an extended trip to Israel, he met some ketubah artists, he said.

"I found there were many people who wanted ketubot and so many wonderful artists doing great work. And yet is was often difficult for people to find the ketubah that they were looking for."

Shapiro set up his company, Ketubah Ketubah, two years ago to market ketubot internationally, helping buyers from all over the world find the ketubah of their choice. Ketubot are also popular anniversary gifts, he added.

He advertises throughout the United States and Canada, attends Jewish conventions and makes use of the Internet as a marketing tool, Shapiro explained.

"I recognized that the Internet would be the perfect vehicle to make the ketubah easily available to Jews everywhere… Many of my customers are in places with smaller communities with no local source for ketubot." But he notes that even Toronto residents find the Web site helpful.

He said the catalogue, which he mails out through requests on his local and toll free numbers (it's also available on the Internet), appeals to busy young professionals who are happy to shop at home.

The catalogue has more than 100 ketubot.

Shapiro said his business is benefiting from a resurgence of interest in Judaica among people of all ages. He said exposure through the Ashkenaz Judaica show this summer, which he headed, as well as his participation in wedding trade shows, have increased demand for handcrafted ketubot.

Local residents can visit the Ketubah Ketubah warehouse by booking an appointment with Shapiro. People from outside the Toronto area can order a catalogue or call him at this toll free number: 1-888-KETUBAH (538-8224).

Other advertising ketubot designers are: Katubah, Haftorah by Karny Varona, 416-226-3131.

The Symbols of Jewish Life (top) and a replica of an 18th century Italian ketubah were designed by Claire Ciss.

Photographs an eternal memento of your simchah

An example from Neil Meirovich's portfolio.

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Don't underestimate the photographer. Long after you've forgotten how the food tasted, the photos will remain as lasting mementoes of your wedding or party.

Neil Meirovich of Neil Meirovich Photography (499-4544) and Stuart Sibulash of Sibulash Photography (598-2241) emphasize the importance of the person who takes the pictures.

To choose your photographer, Sibulash advises, get word-of-mouth referrals, and references from a caterer. Then take a cross-section of these and check them personally or on the Internet.

When you narrow your selection, consult with your co-hosts, then go in person to make your final choice.

The photographer shouldn't be the first person you book, Meirovich says, but not the last either. Start thinking about it when you hire the hall or caterer, and do it early enough to get the person you want. For busy times, from May to October, a year in advance is not too early.

Hire someone who values the pride and good name that come from fine work, rather than the sheer quantity of bookings. If you pay a deposit, make sure that the day will be held for you, and that the person you book will be the one at your event. Get this in writing, Sibulash insists. If it may be someone different, meet them as well.

The photographer is in close contact with host and guests from start to finish, unlike the band, which is on stage, or the caterers who are in the kitchen. If the photographer is good at dealing with people, he can use his experience to help you plan, and make your event less rushed.

Meirovich and Sibulash agree that the more you plan ahead, the less to worry about when the day comes. On the big day, Sibulash points out, you'll relax more with a photographer who does his job well and on time, who stays calm, and doesn't project an excess of nervous energy.

Experience teaches a professional to deal with the unexpected, impart organizational skills, and manage details such as stowing backup equipment close at hand (not outside in a truck), yet out of the guests' way. Sibulash ranks these qualities as equal to talent and rapport with the client.

Meirovich says a lot more clients are opting for custom work, rather than photo packages. "Black and white pictures have great potential, as do sepia and monochrome. The photographer has to make up for the lack of color by capturing qualities of light such as intensity and texture, and paying more attention to surroundings and facial expressions."

Sibulash recommends making two more appointments after your first meeting to handle details such as engagement portraits, and to finalize your plans.

Get lots of input, they say, don't hesitate to make your own suggestions and ask a lot of questions. Many people, do not realize, for instance, that photos are available in non-standard sizes.

Both Meirovich and Sibulash advise you to look for someone with distinctive style and a personality you like, combined with respect for your wishes. Sibulash adds that someone who is ideal for weddings might not be the best for a bar mitzvah. That is why it is important to get to know the photographer and view his work.

Nazi gold links dismissed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — None of the wartime gold transferred in Canada between Swiss and Portuguese national banks was connected in any way with Nazi loot, according to a historian's report released last week.

Though the Swiss central bank, the Banque Nationale Suisse (BNS), bought more gold from the Nazis than any other country, none of that gold found its way to Canada, states the report by Carleton University Prof. Duncan McDowall.

McDowall was commissioned by the Bank of Canada to investigate wartime gold transfers after declassified U.S. government documents indicated a 1942 transfer of ownership of gold held in Canadian vaults may have facilitated a separate, parallel transfer in Switzerland of looted Nazi gold between the Swiss and Portuguese central banks.

References to the paper transfer were located by World Jewish Congress researchers. Their findings, released in July, prompted Canadian Jewish Congress to call on the Bank of Canada to investigate what looked like a "classic money-laundering operation."

McDowall's 120-page report, Due Diligence: A report on the Bank of Canada's handling of foreign gold during World War II, found no indication of money-laundering. Tracing wartime events, McDowall found that foreign banks

Joint venture launched

OTTAWA — Canada and Israel will embark on a joint venture to mark the Jewish state's 50th anniversary.

The proposed Canada-Israel Regional Rehabilitation Centre, to be built in a yet-unnamed African nation, will aid victims of land mines, Israel's ambassador to Canada, David Sultan, told Toronto UJA Federation leaders here last week.

The centre will be a comprehensive facility to aid land mine victims, whether medically, socially or economically. Israel and Canada will share the cost, Sultan told The CJN.

He said the project is timely given this week's signing here of a global treaty, spearheaded by Canada, that bans the use and production of anti-personnel land mines.

Although Israel isn't signing the treaty, "it does share the humanitarian concerns" expressed in the document, Sultan said.

Cabinet favors pullout

BY JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — In a declaration of intent, the government announced its willingness to order an IDF withdrawal from unspecified areas of the West Bank until a "permanent arrangement" goes into effect.

With 16 ministers voting in favor and two abstaining – Education Minister Zevulun Hammer and Transport Minister Yitzhak Levy, both from the NRP – a special team to be headed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was authorized to draw up the requisite maps and timetables for implementation of the decision.

The team – which besides the prime minister will consist of Foreign Minister David Levy, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon – was instructed to submit its recommendations for cabinet approval.

"The goal is for the team to report to the government next week," said Cabinet Secretary Dan Naveh.

Naveh stressed that implementation of the troop redeployment hinges on fulfilment of the commitments undertaken by the Palestinian Authority as appended to the Hebron Agreement last January.

Once the ministerial team submits its recommendations, the cabinet "will conduct a thorough discussion and will crystallize its plan for a permanent arrangement," a communique said.

This plan will include "security zones deemed vital to the State of Israel, areas of settlement and other interests, including water and Jewish historical sites," it went on.

The communique's sole reference to a timetable was vague and non-binding, declaring only that "after reaching decisions on this subject the government will decide on the way it will implement the interim measures."

The News in Brief

CANADA

War Crimes Announcement

TORONTO — Justice Minister Anne McLellan and Defence Minister Art Eggleton will be in Toronto on Friday, Dec. 12 to make a public announcement concerning Nazi war criminals.

The two ministers will be at the Earl Bales Club House at 1:30 p.m. The public is invited to attend.

Hate Crimes Conviction

TORONTO — A 22-year-old Courtice man is believed to be the first Canadian convicted for distributing hate literature under Canada's hate crimes laws.

Ted Beavis, a former member of the Heritage Front, was charged with conspiracy to disseminate hate literature after distributing pamphlets, flyers and stickers targeting Jews, blacks and minority groups in the GTA.

Beavis will spend 45 days in jail.

Malaysian PM

TORONTO — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre has called on Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy to reproach the prime minister of Malaysia for a series of highly publicized comments in which he blamed Jews for his country's economic woes.

The Malaysian prime minister was in Vancouver to attend the APEC Conference and to visit Ottawa to encourage Canadian companies to invest in his country.

ISRAEL

Unemployment Soars

JERUSALEM — Israel's unemployment rate has reached its highest level in three years, soaring to 8.1 percent, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics.

According to the bureau, third-quarter figures were the highest since the same rate was recorded in the first quarter of 1994.

The number of unemployed rose to 179,000, up from 169,000 in the second quarter of the year. The civilian labor force totaled 2.2 million.

Lev Banim

JERUSALEM — Lev Banim, a new one-year, Israel-based academic program designed to motivate underachieving, Orthodox Canadian and American boys, ages 17 to 20, has been launched in Jerusalem with the support of Aish Hatorah.

For more information call Rabbi Kornfeld at 718-951-7740.

DNA Tests For Yemenites

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Health Ministry has agreed to fund genetic testing for families of Yemenite children who allegedly disappeared during the early years of Israeli statehood.

The testing may provide some answers and some closure to one of the most painful episodes in the Yemenite immigrant experience.

With the ministry's decision, some $11,000 will be allocated for tests to compare DNA from families with DNA of remnants exhumed from graves in which the children were said to be buried.

WORLD

Short Story Contest

NEW YORK – The Association of Jewish Libraries, in partnership with Pitspopany Press, has launched a new Jewish short story competition for non-published authors writing for middle grade readers (ages 8 to 12). The topic is humorous stories, and the deadline is Feb. 15, 1998.

For more information write to Hazel Karp, 880 Somerset Dr. NW, Atlanta, Ga. 30327.

War Crimes Actions

MOSCOW — Lithuania has launched an investigation of a suspected Nazi war criminal living in the Baltic nation.

The decision to investigate Kazys Gimzauskas was given a cautious welcome by Jewish leaders, who said similar moves in the past against suspected war criminals had failed to lead to convictions.

War Crimes Suspect Dies

MOSCOW — A Lithuanian suspected of committing war crimes during the Nazi occupation has died without ever being brought to trial.

Antanas Mincikis, 80, died Nov. 24 at an old-age home.

Israeli Minister Visits Pollard in Jail

JERUSALEM — Absorption Minister Yuli Edelstein has become the first Israeli government minister to visit Jonathan Pollard in jail.

Edelstein met on Nov. 24 with the former U.S. Navy intelligence analyst, who is serving a life sentence for spying for Israel.

Edelstein, whose meeting was cleared with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Israel's attorney general, conveyed a letter written by Netanyahu's spokesperson, David Bar-Illan, that contained a pledge from the premier to continue every effort to secure Pollard's release.

Edelstein recently initiated the meeting, saying the Israeli government was not doing enough to help Pollard. Edelstein's spokesperson said after the meeting that Pollard was cynical about the promises made by Israeli leaders to act on his behalf.

Pollard was arrested in 1985 outside the Israeli Embassy in Washington. He pleaded guilty in 1986 to stealing secrets for the Israeli government and in 1987, he was sentenced to life imprisonment.

War crimes, gov't policy on agenda for fly-in

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Seven of 11 Nazi war crimes cases initiated by the federal government will come to trial within the next nine months, Ottawa's chief war crimes prosecutor assured a group of Toronto United Jewish Appeal leaders here last week.

Despite widespread feelings to the contrary in Canada's Jewish community, prosecutions are "close to the optimal pace," Paul Vickery told about 40 participants in the first-ever UJA Ottawa fly-in – a packed day of briefings from government and other officials.

Legal motions in three other stalled cases will resume in Toronto this month, added Vickery, director of the Justice Department's crimes against humanity and war crimes section.

"I want to assure you that my unit is pressing forward with what we believe to be an honest and dedicated effort to bring to justice those who committed war crimes," Vickery said.

Since January 1995, when the government changed course from unsuccessful criminal prosecutions of alleged Nazi war criminals, to attempting to revoke their citizenship and deport them, Ottawa has launched 14 cases, Vickery told the UJA leaders.

Two of the accused, Josef Nemsila and Antanas Kenstavicius, have since died, while another, Ladislas Csatary, voluntarily left Canada after the federal cabinet stripped him of his citizenship, and he has been barred from returning, Vickery explained.

The trial of Wasily Bogutin concluded in Toronto last week.

Hearings for five other named alleged war criminals will begin between December and August.

Two other suspects will be named "in the near future."

Vickery said Canada's pace "compares favorably" with that in the United States. He was careful to note, however, that these are not prosecutions for war crimes, but rather hearings to determine whether the accused lied to gain citizenship by concealing his war-era activities, and is thus eligible for deportation.

"We can report very good progress," Vickery said. "We are doing everything we can to expedite the trials, and I think we've achieved considerable success. I think our record speaks for itself."

Vickery bristled at a suggestion that he was patting himself on the back.

"I am attempting to tell you what we're doing now," he snapped. "I am attempting to tell you that we have a very active program."

Each case is "an overwhelming task" for the unit's staff of 20 in Ottawa, 12 lawyers in Toronto and others in Vancouver and Montreal.

In the decade prior to 1995, four Nazi war crimes trials took place, with no convictions.

Today's war crimes unit "should be judged on its current efforts and successes," Vickery said, adding, though, that there has been "no excuse" for delays.

"All we can do is plow ahead. We're doing our best."

Lloyd Axworthy

Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy, in a well-received talk, said he was "pleased" that the forged passport affair was closed.

During his recent meetings in Israel with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Foreign Minister David Levy, Axworthy said, he received written assurances that faked or altered Canadian passports would never again be used in Mossad operations – as they had been in September – and that Israel has issued directives to that effect.

Continued debate on the matter – such as statements made by former Canadian ambassador to Israel Norman Spector – places Canadians travelling in the region "in jeopardy," Axworthy said.

The minister said he got the "sense" that Israel is ready to move to final negotiations in the peace process, and that there is "room for dialogue" in all Arab states, except Lebanon.

Earlier this year, Axworthy told Canadian Jewish leaders that he would try to facilitate Israel's inclusion in one of the geographical groupings at the United Nations. Israel is the only country to be shunned from all the large blocs at the UN. Only members of a bloc can belong to UN committees.

Axworthy had said earlier that he would press for Israel's inclusion in the Western Europe and Others Group.

But he told the UJA leaders that he would now advise Israel to "forget it" because the group is too dominated by the European Union, which makes decisions "unilaterally" and votes "en bloc."

While he still supports Israel's membership in a UN bloc, he said he now doubts the "utility" of the Western Europe Group.

URGENT APPEAL

We are appealing to the members of our community to help a family facing tragically difficult challenges at this time. Dov, his wife and their eight children moved to Jerusalem a number of years ago. There, he became a successful sofer (scribe) and teacher.

Recently, tragedy struck. Their youngest daughter required lifesaving heart surgery in Boston to correct a rare heart condition. The cost of the operation was $200,000 U.S. This depleted all of the family's funds and burdened them with a heavy debt. Now, Dov has been stricken with cancer and due to the arduous treatments, he is unable to work. The family is in desperate straits.

We turn to individuals such as yourself to help this family in their time of need. In merit of your generous act of tzedaka, may you be blessed with health and happiness. Thank you.

New Jewish writing

I have written about The CJN's mandate on a number of occasions. The basic policy and purpose of The Canadian Jewish News is "to serve the Jewish people in Canada, in Israel and in all its habitations."

The chief way we "serve the Jewish people" is by providing our readers with news of the Jewish world in a reliable and credible manner.

But this is not the only way.

Another way, and one that is very precious to us, is by encouraging more Jewish writers to write.

We regularly invite our readers, young and old, to submit their work to us. Of course, we cannot publish all the submissions that we receive. But we do try to publish as many as space and opportunity allow.

Moreover, from time to time, we dedicate special issues as showcases for new "Jewish" writing by unpublished or seldom-published writers. For example, on Chanukah we publish the "winners" of our poetry contest; and on Pesach we have inaugurated a special literary supplement.

There are many talented, creative writers and poets in our midst; but too few vehicles in Canada where their writing can appear. It is important therefore, that The CJN become one of those vehicles.

Against this backdrop, I want to bring our readers' attention to three recently published new works of "Jewish writing," each of which has a CJN connection.

The sixth annual issue of Parchment is now available for purchase.

Parchment is an independent journal located at the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, featuring contemporary Canadian Jewish writings. Its editor is Adam Fuerstenberg. Its founding editor is CJN columnist Shel Krakofsky.

Like its predecessor volumes, volume 6 is a trove of wonderfully eclectic, entertaining, often inspiring and moving writing.

As reported in The CJN (Nov. 6), one of the authors whose fiction is featured in volume 6 of Parchment, Gabriella Goliger of Ottawa, is one of two writers to share the $10,000 Journey Prize for her writing. The story for which she won the award, Maladies of the Inner Ear, was published in volume 5 of Parchment.

This most recent issue of Parchment also features a mildly jarring, but poignant short story by Bill Gladstone, one of The CJN's columnists and regular contributors.

Parchment is a vital display case for Canadian writers. It is also a delight for the reader to peek in.

Rafi Aaron's poetry appeared in The CJN's special Pesach literary supplement.

At that time, in April, we published his evocative and sorrowful The Photograph of the Children. Since then, that poem along with a collection of other of his poems, have been published in an anthology entitled A Seed in the Pocket of their Blood (Amphitheatre Publications Ltd).

The book explores through poetry and photography various themes of Jewish life in Europe, North America and Israel. It combines Aaron's provocative poems with a score of stunning photographs taken by internationally renowned Canadian and Israeli photographers.

The anthology, however, appears in more than a book. It is actually also a travelling exhibit.

The travelling exhibit project was launched at the Toronto Jewish Book Fair. It is slated to tour North America for over two years.

Aaron, a native of Ottawa, writes in a compelling manner. His poetry is compact but descriptive. The reader travels in his language as if in craft on a river, occasionally bumping along the river's edge into sharp, jagged emotions, but always being swept ever forward to the inevitable crescendo of emotion and thought.

His subjects are familiar ones, the details of Jewish experience.

Rabbi Arieh L. Ofseyer's writing also appeared in The CJN's special Pesach literary supplement. His short story A Wedding in a Cemetery was among the stories that we selected to feature in our supplement.

Like the poem of Rafi Aaron, that particular short story by Rabbi Ofseyer has also been gathered into a collection of some of his other writings and recently published. The work is entitled A Pioneer from The Shtetl (Golden Acres, Dallas).

It is an anthology of 51 different vignettes from his past. They are arranged more or less in a chronological time piece from his first days in his shtetl of Lutzk, in the Ukraine to his days as a young pioneer in then-Palestine

NYGH helping Branson

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Keeping Branson Hospital open for full service as long as possible is a top priority of adjoining hospitals.

For example, North York General Hospital (NYGH) is recruiting emergency nurses on behalf of Branson and is sending its own nurses and physicians to Branson to relieve shortages.

"I don't think anyone believes that we can keep it [Branson] open until the planned transfer date of June 1999," said Murray MacKenzie, NYGH president and CEO.

Renovations required

"But we'll turn ourselves inside out to keep it going," he added.

A key item in ongoing negotiations, he said, is the urgent need for long-term care beds at Branson, even after it is supposed to be only a medical walk-in clinic.

Final details on this need may not be settled until April 1998, because even though Branson has space designated for long-term care patients, certain renovations will need to be made. For this reason, officials of the Ontario Ministry of Health are involved, along with Branson, NYGH, York Central Hospital and Humber River.

The shortage of clinical and emergency nurses is shaping up to be a full-blown crisis for all Metro hospitals, MacKenzie said.

Branson's emergency department is closing at night for that reason. Cases usually handled at Branson during the night will be served at NYGH, which has added more in-patient facilities to its emergency department.

In discussions with all four hospitals and with officials of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA Federation, it was agreed in principle that there should be transportation service from Branson to other hospitals. This will require Ministry approval.

Admissions to NYGH have risen sharply, mostly from the Branson area, MacKenzie said.

Prager rejects Jewish unity

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish unity is an illusion. It has never existed and neither is it a goal worth striving for. Instead, Jews should consider ways of living together based on three points of commonality, a UJA Federation dinner gathering was told recently.

Support for the well-being of Israel, fighting anti-Semitism and perpetuating the Jewish religion are three foundation stones for the Jewish people, said Dennis Prager, a syndicated U.S. talk show host and author and lecturer on Jewish issues.

Prager was keynote speaker at the annual major gifts and Atarah event of the 1998 UJA campaign. Mixing a witty sense of humor with provocative analysis, Prager had 450 UJA contributors enthralled.

He suggested that diverse Jewish groups have different roles to play at this juncture of Jewish history, similar to the distinct roles ascribed in biblical times to the priests, Levites and congregation of Yisrael. "One should make peace with that [idea] and realize it's okay to have differences."

Jews have never been unified, Prager said. Even in biblical times after the Exodus from Egypt, Korach led a group who confronted Moses.

"I've never called for Jewish unity," he said. "I'm actually scared by [it]."

People who call for unity, he said, do so with the expectation it will be on their terms. But diversity can have benefits. Pointing to the development of democracy, Prager noted it didn't arise in lands where the authoritarian Roman Catholic Church held sway, but in Protestant areas where religious denominations thrived.

"My worry is not that there are many denominations. My worry is that there are too many who couldn't care," he said.

Point one of his approach, supporting the well-being of Israel, is necessary because a strong Israel provides Jews everywhere with security and a refuge. Prager said he preferred a Jew who ate pork on Yom Kippur to Neturei Karta Chassidim who opposed Israel's existence unless it was established by the Messiah. He also criticized Jews on the left who care more for universal issues than they do for Jewish ones. These people are not part of the Jewish world, he suggested.

Jews must also oppose anti-Semitism, said Prager, co-author of Why the Jews? The Reason for Anti-Semitism. Jews serve as a sort of "miner's canary," detecting noxious fumes of hatred before others in society. Those who begin by hating Jews always end by hating others, he said.

Turning to his third point, perpetuating the Jewish religion, Prager said "the Jewish people cannot survive the death of the Jewish religion as much as the Jewish religion cannot survive the death of the Jewish people.

"We should aim to become serious Jews," he said. Prager, who claimed to have a foot in three Jewish camps, Orthodox, Conservative and Reform, suggested Jews could even "try to keep Shabbat in the car."

He said his family has a meaningful Shabbat experience driving to synagogue, when they sing Jewish songs and discuss the Torah portion of the week.

"There can be non-Orthodox religiosity...because if we don't develop it, we're doomed."

He said the three major strands of Judaism each have a place in the Jewish world: the Orthodox are "like our priestly class," retreating from the world. "We need the Orthodox because it gives [others] something to bounce off, to see how far we've moved from a given point."

At the other end of the scale, Reform is "out in the world entirely, measuring its Judaism by the world's yardstick."

This approach can lead to chaos, Prager conceded, but there is also chaos in each wing of Judaism. "That's what I tell the groups, "You have beautiful parts and ugly parts."

Quoting former prisoner of Zion, Natan Sharansky, Prager said, "If any one Jewish group wins, Jewry loses."

Dinner-goers also heard from Leo Goldhar, 1998 UJA Federation campaign chair, who reported that more than $36.5 million had been raised to date, $1 million more than last year.

Barry Sherman, chair of Legacy, the UJA's capital and endowment campaign, said $45 million has been committed in the first few months of the campaign. The campaign goal is to raised $150 million in endowments and capital funds in the next few years, to generate a revenue stream to ensure sufficient funds for capital projects, programming and for unforeseen eventualities.

Rabbi discusses life with AIDS

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Rabbi Cynthia Culpeper is the first person in her family to have become a rabbi, the first female rabbi of her synagogue in Montgomery, Ala., and the first rabbi in North America known to have AIDS.

Rabbi Culpeper, 35, who converted to Judaism as a young adult and was ordained at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in 1995, was an operating nurse before entering rabbinical school. In 1994, she contracted AIDS from a needle wound while still a nurse.

She spoke recently at the annual I. Jeffrey Presement Memorial Lecture jointly presented by the AIDS committees of Holy Blossom Temple, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am and Beth Tzedec congregations. Also on the panel were Louise Binder, chair of Voices of Positive Women in Ontario, and Ron Rosenes, chair of the AIDS Committee of Toronto.

When she was first diagnosed, Rabbi Culpeper told the capacity crowd at Holy Blossom, "it was a very lonely time. Did I trust my diagnosis with the Montgomery congregation? I decided to test the waters. I addressed controversial subjects such as alcoholism, and I wore a red ribbon for AIDS awareness. I could tell that they were thinking, 'These are not problems in our community. These are not

Rabbi Cynthia Culpeper

Jewish problems.'"

When she read a seven-page address to her congregation, however, telling them how she contracted the disease and how AIDS is, indeed, a Jewish problem, "the reaction was overwhelmingly positive. I told them that AIDS education and awareness is Torah, Torah is teaching and teaching is best shown by how we live our lives publicly, not by the silence we maintain privately."

AIDS, said Rabbi Culpeper, now a Hebrew teacher in Birmingham, Ala., "changes everything. There is the lack of spontaneity. Going on a trip means packing more pills than clothes, and the simple pleasure of eating whatever and whenever you wish no longer exists."

However, she finds "tremendous strength within Judaism. AIDS represents a lack of control and I find that the set liturgy [found in Judaism] is comfortable. It is something that is steady when everything is out of control. At a time when I am at a loss for words, I have found comfort in a tradition that has words for me."

Part of the Jewish tradition, she said, is to care about other people and to visit the sick. "We are also taught to take care of ourselves. AIDS is a 100 percent preventable disease, but because people are still testing positive, we have to... keep educating so people can take care of [themselves].

"I ask all of you to be rabbis regarding the Torah of AIDS. Protect yourself and protect others by bringing knowledge. In Pirkei Avot it says, 'The day is short, the work is great... and the Master is insistent.' In other words, G-d is calling all of us to end the epidemic."

Binder, who was diagnosed with AIDS in 1993, said that even though people know how to prevent AIDS, the number of cases is not decreasing. "Worldwide, as of the end of 1996, 29.2 million people were infected. Everyday, 8,500 people are infected and 40 percent of those are women. At the end of 1996, 42,000 people in Canada were living with HIV. The new cases in Canada in 1996 numbered 5,000, compared to 3,000 in 1994 or 1995. The numbers are rising and the median age is dropping."

The disease is still considered a gay disease, says Binder, "and that is absolutely wrong. There are many groups at risk and many people are not in a position to protect themselves. The stigma of being infected continues to keep people from speaking out; so the misinformation continues. Women are not seen by the medical profession as being at risk and young people are not being taught about AIDS. Until we demand changes, people will continue to be infected."

Romberg leaving JIAS for post at UJA Federation

TORONTO — Perry Romberg, executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Toronto, for 10 years, will be joining UJA Federation as a senior planning and allocations executive early next year.

"We are very enthusiastic about Perry joining the family," says UJA Federation vice-president, community planning and development, Morris Zbar. "His experience, enthusiasm and pulse on community needs will be a valuable contribution to our organization."

Over the past two decades, Romberg has held several social service positions including supervisor of the Jewish Family & Child Service Foster Care Program, and clinical manager of the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre.

"Now I am looking forward to planning for larger community needs," says Romberg.

Dangerous signs

Israel's government last weekend confirmed its willingness to move forward with further redeployment of its security forces from the territories in return for the Palestinian Authority's strict compliance with its written commitments to Israel, including fighting terrorism, abjuring incitement to violence and finally replacing the PLO charter.

In anticipation of precisely such an announcement, some Israelis opposed to any withdrawal, let alone more, took to the streets in protest. On Saturday night, there was, for example, the usual but totally acceptable demonstration outside the prime minister's residence. Earlier in the week, however, there was another kind of demonstration, this one totally unacceptable.

Posters were plastered throughout downtown Jerusalem; in the posters, the prime minister was depicted wearing a kaffiyeh across the top of which in large inflammatory letters was written: Liar!!!

The appearance of the posters was a shocking reminder of the incendiary campaign waged against Yitzhak Rabin by hateful extremists weeks before he was killed. It marks the first time we have seen this hauntingly similar form of odious expression directed at to the policies of this prime minister.

They are dangerous signs.

As circumstance and pressure build up to advance the peace process more definitively, the decisions the government will face, especially ones involving territorial compromise, will become more difficult.

Aharon Domb, a spokesperson for Yesha, the movement representing the settlers in the West Bank and Gaza, condemned the use of the posters. Lay and religious leaders, here and abroad, must also condemn and deplore their use lest heated but lawful dissent once again crosses over into anarchic strife.

Dangerous distinctions

Early last week, in a speech in Edmonton, former Parti Québécois (PQ) leader Jacques Parizeau repeated his infamous referendum-loss assessment.

Recanting nothing, he identified precisely whom he had meant when he blamed the separatists' loss on the "ethnics." It was the Greeks, the Italians and the Jews.

Parizeau's refining prose was as reprehensible last week as it was in the last referendum. He does not distinguish between Québécois who support separatism as opposed to those who do not. Rather, he distinguishes between the supporters of separatism, who by inference, are the real Québécois; and the "ethnics," who by equal inference, are not real Québécois.

He again draws distinctions which are unbefitting a democracy, improper in a land where the rule of law and equality govern, and dangerous in a society where heated nationalistic emotions hover near the surface.

When asked to comment on this most recent pronouncement by his predecessor, Premier Lucien Bouchard defended him as "a great democrat." But we have questions of the premier regarding his conceptions of democrat and democracy.

In what great democracy is such unrepentant, heavy-handed singling out of minorities considered to be appropriate?

In what great democracy is this kind of differentiation among voters not considered to be a form of subtle "intimidation?"

And in what great democracy is such "intimidation" considered to be an acceptable standard of behavior for political leaders?

The separatists hue to the language of democracy but not to its practices.

But as we have learned from our sages, we will know them by their deeds and not by their sayings.

Rabbi Stern's views on conversion issue

It is rather apparent that it is open season on "Orthodox bashing." The New Israel Fund is rather blatant and open in its advertisement and the Jewish establishment is more subtle, but both cannot disguise their disgust and disdain for Orthodox Judaism. I might add that the display of anger and contempt is all in the name of, and for the sake of, "unity." A strange way indeed to foster "unity." The issue – and catch word – is "pluralism."

This simply means: yes to the sanctioning of gay marriage; yes to the recognition of patrilineal descent; yes to the ordination of women "rabbis;" yes to each individual deciding on issues of Jewishness, and no external guide (Halachah) will set standards; yes to the officiating at mixed marriages; yes to the rejection of the Sinaiatic divinity of Revelation of Torah, etc.; and yes, you will accept all this and more as authentic Jewish tradition.

Surely most reasonable people can understand that it would be spiritual suicide for Israel to officially sanction and recognize this view of Judaism.

In the meantime, the Orthodox will continue to reach out with love and sincerity to all Jews, regardless of their affiliation. Jews generally are not interested in the politics and agenda of the Jewish establishment. The Jewish concern is to stem and reverse the tide of assimilation and ignorance.

The Orthodox, with their yeshivot, day schools, high schools and outreach organizations, will continue to share with all Jews an approach to Torah life that has successfully made assimilation, drugs and other ills of society a non-issue in that community.

Indeed, let us, the ordinary Jews, join together in enhancing our Judaism, and let the establishment play its politics. The future will decide who truly cared about "unity," and who fostered Jewish survival.

Soap made of Shoah victims

I wish to add to information provided by A. Wesiberg in his letter to the editor (CJN, Nov. 13), regarding the use of soap made of human remains.

Like Wesiberg, I also fully believe that such soap was manufactured from the remains of Holocaust victims, and in fact, that such pieces exist today, not only in museums, but in peoples' personal collections.

About five years ago, as a member of the Ottawa Shoah (Holocaust) Remembrance Committee, I was on duty as a docent at the Simon Wiesenthal exhibit, The Courage To Remember. A pleasant and well dressed man thanked me, but maintained that more items should have been on show. He then explained the reason.

His father had been a soldier in the Canadian Army during World War II, and he had been one of the liberators of the concentration camps. Against army regulations, some of the soldiers had taken away with them as souvenirs some of the ghastly remnants which they found at the camps. This man's father still has in his possession today a bar of soap that was made of human remains.

Alleges bias on editor's part

I would like to comment on "From the editor's desk" (CJN, Nov. 13), in which you evaluate letters received on the subject of the "City Of David Synagogue." While you have every right to your evaluation, it would seem more appropriate for you to publish the letters and let the readers make their own assessment.

Your views are biased because of what you believe of a religious nature. You are not neutral as an editor should be, but tend to have Orthodox leanings – and thus your jaundiced view of the scheme of things, with reference to the Orthodox outlook. Publish other views on the subject. Don't suppress thought and discussion just because it doesn't meet with your approval, as they do in countries run by dictators.

Why honor Harris at Yad Vashem?

I was shocked to read (CJN, Oct. 30) that the Canadian Society of Yad Vashem was honoring Mike Harris.

This is a man who has pushed welfare recipients to food banks. He has been condemned by Catholic bishops. Social programs have been eliminated. Hospitals have been closed. Welfare recipients have been ridiculed. The education system has been decimated. Legislative debate has been restricted.

For any Jewish organization to honor a government which is autocratic at best and fascist at worst is contrary to human decency.

Need to be Jewish on and off campus

In his book, The Making of a Jew, Edgar Bronfman talks about the importance of Jewish students "doing Jewish" on and off campus.

Bronfman and executive president of Hillel International Richard Joel have been two of the leading forces in seeing Hillel grow around the globe. In addition to North America, Hillel centres exist in Europe, the Former Soviet Union and Israel. Hillel's organizational philosophy of "empowering and engaging" Jewish students around the world has been at the forefront of the Jewish communal agenda.

Perspectives

Canada's Jewish press is 100 years old

By LEWIS LEVENDEL

This article provides background to the National Library exhibition, The Canadian Jewish Press, 1897 to 1997. The exhibition, which runs to Dec. 12, was drawn from the library's Canadiana collection and curated by Cheryl Jaffee of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection.

In its first 100 years, the Canadian Jewish press has informed, entertained, educated, consoled and aggravated its readership; strengthened religious and ethnic identity; and served as a forum for individuals, institutions and the entire community.

At the beginning of its second century, the Canadian Jewish press remains an unmined treasure of Canadian archives, and a mirror of Jewish expression through the years, found in dozens of publications — not only in English and Yiddish, but also in French, Hebrew, Hungarian and Russian.

An important role in the community

Canadian Jewish journals have played an important role in maintaining cultural distinctiveness, and greatly helped to ignite and sustain vital communal fundraising campaigns, and the major local and national bodies such as the Zionist Organization of Canada, United Jewish Appeal and Canadian Jewish Congress. Smaller institutional papers and specialized journals have been essential in consolidating special-interest bodies such as cultural, fraternal, labor, youth and Zionist organizations, and synagogues and other communal institutions.

In the early years of this press, much original literature — both prose and poetry — first appeared on the pages of English and Yiddish Jewish publications. Many of the works of Canadian literary giant A.M. Klein initially were printed in Jewish periodicals he edited. Celebrated arts critic Nathan Cohen's earliest commentaries can be found in the Canadian Jewish press. And novelist and former Canada Council literary head Naïm Kattan wrote for and edited French-language Jewish publications.

But others who also contributed fine work to this press should be better known. There were many top-drawer writers and commentators who never broke into Canadian mainstream publications — either by choice or by circumstance. In the first half of this century, Jewish journalists, writers, poets and scholars were not as welcome in mainstream publications as they are today.

Readers of this press will discover some of the finest writers, journalists and commentators this country has produced. A fascinating portraiture of Canadian life through this century can be found in the work of A.B. Bennett, Julius Hayman, J.B. (Joe) Salsberg, Ben Kayfetz, Joshua Gershman and Noach Wittman — all of whom contributed, or have continued to contribute, to this press for more than 50 years.

As well, readers will recognize the names of writers who went on to become better known to their fellow Canadians — Irving Layton, Leonard Cohen, Mordecai Richler, Moses Znaimer, Irving Abella, Ted Allan, Alan Borovoy and Miriam Waddington.

The Jewish Times

The first continuing Canadian Jewish publication was the English-language The Jewish Times, founded in Montreal in 1897 to respond in part to the anti-Semitism ignited by the Dreyfus trial in France. The wave of anti-Semitism engendered by the trial had reached Canadian shores. Some of the Canadian press, especially in Quebec, were echoing the virulent anti-Jewish slander of publications in France. At that time, there were about 12,000 Jews in Canada — 5,000 in Montreal. Two young men — Lyon Cohen, 28, later to become founding president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and Sam Jacobs, 26, later to become Eastern Canada's first Jewish member of Parliament — decided to launch a fortnightly publication. The first issue was dated Dec. 10, 1897.

Glancing through the 17 years of The Times, one finds reportage and commentary on anti-Jewish incidents and the organization of the Zionist movement in Canada, a lively letters-to-the editor page, literary contributions in each issue, and cartoons and other original illustrations. There were news and social items from Montreal, Ottawa, Quebec City, Toronto, Glace Bay, Halifax, Hamilton, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Unfortunately, The Times proved to be more an artistic success than a commercial one, because Yiddish was the primary language of most Canadian Jews in the first decade of this century. But The Times set standards that have been matched only occasionally by succeeding English-language publications.

Historian David Rome, who wrote a book about The Times, judged it "by far the best newspaper produced for Canadian Jewry."

The Yiddish Press

For about 40 years in the first part of this century, the Yiddish press served immigrants to Canada as a guide, counsellor, comforter, educator and cultural mentor. Montreal and Winnipeg, and to a lesser extent Toronto, became known throughout the Jewish world as flourishing centres of Yiddish culture. The attitude of many Jews to the Yiddish press in its heyday was one of admiration and even love. The papers became part of Jewish life, and its writers, members of the Jewish family.

The Kanader Odler (Jewish Daily Eagle) of Montreal, begun in 1907, was the home of a celebrated school of city Yiddishists who gained international stature for their prose, poetry and lively commentary. At their best, the Yiddish publications were vigorous in their advocacy. They were considered a catalyst in shaping the Jewish milieu of the time.

The Holocaust, Canada and Canadian Jewry

In recent years, historians have been researching the actions of the Canadian government before, during and after the Holocaust, and the actions or inaction of the Canadian Jewish community during that period. My research indicates that Canadian Jews, if they were reading their press, were well warned of the coming catastrophe. The Jewish press frequently focused a spotlight on the dangers of the rise of Adolf Hitler and his Nazi party, and subsequently on the destruction of European Jewry.

Reflecting the position of a good portion of Canadian Jewish leadership prior to the war, the Canadian Jewish Review editorially made the argument against Canadian Jewish militants, whom it labeled "natural born trouble-seekers." The editorial continued: "The quiet, unostentatious behavior which tens of thousands of Jews practice from choice or because it is natural to them, is safer as a matter of policy in times like this than the quarrelsome, disputations, self-righteous manner of those who press for their 'rights.' "

During World War II, the Toronto Daily Hebrew Journal's English-page editor, David Rome, attacked what he labelled "the business-as-usual attitude of North American Jews," saying they were "fiddling while fellow Jews rolled to their destruction." At the end of the war, Winnipeg Jewish Post editorialist Hy Sokolov begged for a more open Canadian immigration policy for Jewish refugees languishing in Europe. He censured the people of Canada as "indifferent to the agony of the helpless victims of Nazism, and in closing their hearts, they allowed thousands to perish."

The Canadian Jewish Press Today

In this time of cable TV, satellite dishes and the Internet, and despite the gradual assimilation of Jews into the Canadian mainstream, there remains a vital Jewish press in this country, located in large cities from Vancouver to Halifax. Some of the newspapers remain independently owned and operated — a healthy trend away from publications funded by the central communal fundraising bodies. A watchdog press, which can air important issues of the day and provide provocative and stimulating journalism and commentary, is a valuable asset for Canada and Canadian Jewry.

As it celebrates its centenary, the Canadian Jewish press appears to be healthier — both creatively and financially — than it was more than a decade ago when I was researching my book. Long may it prosper!

Lewis Levendel, author of A Century of the Canadian Jewish Press: 1880s-1980s, published in 1989 by Borealis Press of Ottawa, served as a consultant to the exhibition, The Canadian Jewish Press, 1897-1997.

Opinions

Who is Israel's grandfather?

By Emil Fackenheim in Jerusalem

Two recent incidents have cast doubt in my mind as to whether we are ready to celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary on May 14, 1998; the first of these incidents is happening in Germany; the second, absurdly enough, in Jerusalem.

Once, Germans were told that the torturers and murderers were only SS fanatics, sworn to blind obedience. Now exhibits of pictures in German cities demonstrate that the army was implicated as well, a hard thing to take for the young, nearly every German having a grandfather who was a soldier. Hence, quite understandably, many – though some doubtless with neo-Nazi motives – want a Schluss-Strich for the 12 years of Hitlerism, a big "line-for-an-end," a being-done with what is euphemistically called "those terrible years."

However, the big trauma is not expressed in "never again," the fear that it might happen again, but in the fact that once it did happen, a shock calling everything into question, our faith (Jewish and Christian), even civilization itself. And who should confront that shock, with the aim of mending what can be mended, if not German philosophers, theologians, ordinary folk?

But now, to quote a recent Jerusalem Report front page, some Jews in Germany are "German, Jewish…and proud of it." One understands their attitude, for while their parents were squeamish about Jewishness, sitting with bags metaphorically packed, the children are open about it, even celebrating Jerusalem Day in the heart of Berlin. What escapes them, however, is that they might be the ultimate Schluss-Strich-Zieher, helping make the Schluss-Strich final.

They would not do well either if visiting the real Jerusalem – in case they went to a display currently in the Israel Museum. What made the authorities put on a show letting the visitor imagine herself to be Eva Braun? She was Hitler's mistress, whom he married in the Berlin bunker before both killed themselves. Every survivor would consider the very idea revolting, though I cannot vouch for survivors' children, of whom the author of the show is one. (A picture of him in the show, as a child, has a Hitler mustache.)

Imagining someone's bedroom involves, in any case, a lot of voyeurism, and in Hitler's case – he was sexually abnormal – also obscenity, and if this, in America, is nowadays praised for artistic honesty, why not in Jerusalem? But here the visitor is likely Jewish, and a Jewess in Hitler's bedroom at his sexual mercy is the ultimate in Jewish self-abasement, and – this seems the author's rationale – we must express it if we are to get rid of it.

But this is not how to celebrate what happened on May 14, 1948. Some still view Hitler as the grandfather of Israel, since a UN conscience stricken by his crimes established the state.

But, as David Ben-Gurion put it: "We did not fight in 1948 to establish the state. We fought to defend it. The UN gave it international sanction and then ran away. We brought it about ourselves.

The Yishuv had been advised to postpone Jewish statehood, but they decided that it was "now or never," declared it, defended it and thereby raised the Star of David from deepest abasement in the Holocaust to its proper honor, on the flag of the state.

Who is the grandfather of Israel? Perhaps Mordecai Anielewicz, the leader of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, who died in it. Or perhaps Antek Zuckerman, who survived and explained its meaning to Israelis. "Why did we fight, when we knew our fight was hopeless? We did it for future generations. We did it for you."

From Clal to Chai

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

For many years, the name of Rabbi Irving (Yitz) Greenberg has been identified with the acronym CLAL, which stands for National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership. It was, and is, an educational network defined by its name: operating along non-denominational lines, it tries to increase the level of learning amongst the leadership of North American Jewish organizations and has engendered a high level of competence, devotion and support.

A recent newsletter entitled Contact, informs me that Yitz, as he is known to many of his friends and devotees, has given up the presidency of CLAL and is devoting himself to a new foundation called CHAI – the Jewish Life Network. He says he wished "to work on some important new projects to strengthen the inner life of American Jewry."

In a cogent summation of where we in North America are as Jews, he has this to say: "In the past 50 years, world Jewry has accomplished the greatest political and social transformation of its history (and possibly, of world history). In these decades, Jewry has come from powerlessness to power, from vulnerability and worthlessness in political terms to dignity and influence in the eyes of the world. After the Holocaust, world Jewry determined to transform itself and its institutions in order to restore the value of Jewish life. The State of Israel was established; one of the world's greatest armies was developed.

"Over the years American (and Diaspora) Jewry learned new skills, both political and economic. Whole communities were transformed from lands of oppression to lands of freedom (mostly Israel). In the process, Communist tyranny was undermined and freedom advanced. Today, Jews are more likely to be saved when in danger, more readily admitted to refuge, more likely to be placed on the world agenda when they are persecuted. Around the world, non-Jews seek to pass as Jews in order to gain access to these privileges (admittedly, Jews are also most likely to be attacked and Israel's existence is still not secure). Still, the overall accomplishment is astonishing and indeed historic."

Having emphasized how far we have come to enjoy the blessings of life, he has a warning for us: "All this was achieved the old-fashioned way – by hard work, total dedication and creative transformation. Money was raised on a scale never before done; giving and raising money became a mark of status and a driving force behind the rise of federations to centrality in American Jewish life." (The same development is now observable in Canadian Jewish life.)

Then Rabbi Greenberg comes to his major point: "Unfortunately, the same was not done for Jewish religious and cultural life. Far from unifying to meet the crisis, religious denominations polarized in different responses to choice and freedom: they turned their fear of assimilation and anger into conflict with each other. That conflict has now plunged Israel into a whirlpool of rejection and venom that is undermining its role as a unifier and magnet of loyalty in Jewish life."

Contempt for UN misplaced

By Abba Eban in Jerusalem

Even the greatest of men are liable to err and David Ben-Gurion exercised that right massively when he uttered his expletive, "oom shmoom," to indicate contempt for the United Nations. It was an unworthy statement when it was made and Ben-Gurion's devotees have made it worse by reiterating it endlessly. The truth is that no nation has ever benefited more than Israel from the existence, after World War II, of an international organization capable of filling the vacuum created by the withdrawal of British power.

The fidelity of the UN to Israeli sovereignty was enacted in several stages over the entire first year of Israeli nationhood.

One: On Sept. 1, 1947, I was called to the Palais Des Nations at Geneva to receive the first copy of the conclusions reached by the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP). This body, composed of representatives of small and medium states, had voted by eight votes to three in favor of the partition of Palestine between a Jewish and an Arab state.

I realized that I had become the first human being to set eyes on an international document in which a Jewish state was positively recommended.

Two: On Nov. 29, 1947, the UN General Assembly ratified the conclusions of UNSCOP by a two-thirds majority. From that point on, it was reasonable to describe Jewish statehood as part of the international consensus. It was a dramatic breakthrough for Zionism.

Three: On March 24, 1949, the UN Security Council voted by nine votes to one to support the admission of Israel to membership in the United Nations. Without the sanction of the major powers, including the United States and the Soviet Union, the Nov. 29 resolution would have had no juridical or political effect. Israeli diplomacy was now in the ascendant.

Four: On May 11, 1949, the General Assembly, overriding Arab objections by a wider margin than before, decided that Israel was a member of the UN, which is dedicated to the "sovereign equality of all its members." The May 11 resolution was much more far-reaching in its consequences than all the previous UN enactments, since it created a juridical and political reality which no subsequent defection has been able to undermine. The way was now open for my delegation to secure Israel's entry into all the functional agencies such as the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the World Health Organization and the other institutions that express planetary solidarity.

On the basis of Israel's membership in the United Nations, armistice agreements were signed in 1949 with Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria.

These accords were honored in most of their provisions and Israel was free to open its gates to 680,000 Jewish kinsmen in the first three years of its existence as a state.

It is true that international recognition did not solve Israel's problems of defence and survival, but it is also true that the UN's most important capacity is its unchallenged right to define the international community by its admissions policies. More recently, the UN General Assembly endorsed the Oslo accords in a joint resolution proposed by Israel and the PLO.

No historian has ever imagined a scenario in which Israel could have achieved sovereign recognition so rapidly without the existence of an international organization that became the decisive voice in Israel's emergence.

It is true that in later years it became a UN practice to denigrate Israel and even to describe its Zionist creed as "racism," but it is also true that in a solitary act of contrition, the UN General Assembly annulled that resolution. None of the resolutions virulently hostile to Israel had any binding legal status in UN terms.

Israeli credentials at the UN were fully established at a time when China, Japan, Germany, Italy, the Baltic States and each of the former republics of the Soviet Union languished outside the main body of the international family.

In a recent series of speeches, former secretary of state Henry Kissinger expressed the view that the establishment of an Arab state in a part of the former "Palestine" would be an important element of the current peace process. When I presented my letters of credence to president Truman in September 1950 as ambassador to the United Nations and the United States, he said to me: "You got your state because your leaders made rational proposals and your adversaries did not."

By "your leaders" he meant Chaim Weizmann and Ben-Gurion (he had never met any other Jewish leader). By "rational proposals" he meant that the resolution of Nov. 29, 1947 was not unbalanced: it provided for a Palestinian state side by side with Israel. There was no Likud input to the partition resolution.

In my successful plea for Israel's UN admission on May 5, 1949, I said that "at every stage of Israel's relations with the Arab world we have found equality of status to be the essential condition of partnership." In these conditions, Netanyahu's constant assertion of hostility to Palestinian statehood sets him apart from a growing Israeli consensus and constitutes a major obstacle to regional peace.

Shanghai — a haven for Jewish refugees

After Adolf Hitler's accession to power, Shanghai was the only place where a Jew persecuted by Nazism could emigrate without a visa or family sponsorship.

By Sheldon Kirshner

Ulrike Ottinger's mother, a German Jew, was not aware of Shanghai's peculiar status as a Jewish haven when she went into hiding in Konstanz, a city close to the Swiss border. While Wilhelmina Weinberg, Ottinger's mom, cowered in fear of being betrayed, thousands of German — and Austrian — Jewish refugees streamed into that bustling Chinese port, which had been colonized by Europeans in the 19th century.

Weinberg's ignorance is a source of irony to her 46-year-old daughter, a Berlin filmmaker, particularly now that she has made a movie about Shanghai's place in Jewish history.

The 275-minute documentary — Exile Shanghai, which was screened at the Berlin Film Festival and the Jerusalem Film Festival before touching down at the recent Toronto International Film Festival — skilfully filters this story through the prism of interviews with former residents who now live in the United States.

Shanghai was settled by a succession of Jews — Sephardic Jews in the 1840s seeking business opportunities, Russian Jews in the 1880s and early 1900s fleeing pogroms and revolutionary upheaval, and finally, German and Austrian Jews in the 1930s and 1940s escaping Nazi racism.

Ottinger, who produced, wrote and filmed Exile Shanghai, was drawn to the topic after talking with a group of German Jews in Beijing who had found refuge in China. She had been dimly aware of the exodus, but not the details.

From them, she learned of the three separate but interlocking Jewish communities which had emerged in Shanghai; of the varied institutions the refugees had created; of their relationships with the Chinese multitudes; of the deprivations they had endured when the Japanese occupation authorities established a ghetto in 1943; and of their departure from Shanghai in the aftermath of World War II.

Ottinger, whose collaborator was an Israeli producer named Marek Rosenbaum, started filming in the spring of 1996. By that point, she had interviewed survivors in Israel and the United States, conducted research at Yad Vashem, the Leo Baeck Institute and the Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora, extracted a wealth of information from Germany's ambassador in China, and attended a conference in Berlin on German-Japanese relations during that era.

Filmmaker examines Chinese city

The Chinese government was cooperative enough, but strangely, Ottinger was not permitted to film the last remaining synagogues of Shanghai. "I have no idea why," she said in an interview. Despite this inexplicable prohibition, she sneaked in a few frames of shuls.

Since a Jewish community no longer exists in Shanghai, the synagogue buildings have either been converted to other uses or fallen into ruin.

With the rise of Communism in China, the Jews left in droves, leaving behind a distinct cultural legacy which the passage of time has almost obliterated. "There was a strong anti-foreign, anti-colonial campaign after 1949," she said. "The Chinese government did not distinguish between Jewish refugees and colonialists."

The few Jews who remained in Shanghai and weathered the transition were dedicated Communists. They were eager to build a new society in a country which had been ravished by European and Asian imperialism.

As far as she knows, there are only about 2,000 "Shanghai" Jews left today, and the vast majority reside in Israel, Canada, Australia and the United States.

Three of them appear in Exile Shanghai: Gertrude Alexander, a Viennese dress designer who set sail to China from Liverpool during a German air raid; her husband Theodore, a rabbi who was raised in Berlin; and Rena Krasno, a Russian Jew who was born in Shanghai and whose pungent reminiscences lead off the film.

Ottinger also interviewed a couple in Haifa, a Chinese woman who had wed a German-Jewish doctor. But they are not in the film.

Until recently, the flight of Jews to Shanghai was not exactly common knowledge in Germany. But since the appearance of Ottinger's film, her first on a Jewish topic, there have been articles in the German press and Wannsee House — a Berlin museum which documents the Holocaust from its origins to its finale — has organized a symposium about it.

Asked why she did not cut the epic-length Exile Shanghai, which is expected to open in Canada in 1998, Ottinger sniffed, "This is not a Hollywood film."

It certainly isn't.

19th century Palestine revealed by photographers

Our knowledge of early 19th century Palestine — a neglected, poverty-stricken province of the decrepit Ottoman empire — comes mainly from the diaries, journals, letters and books of hardy travellers and, lest we forget, from pictures taken by a fraternity of immensely curious photographers.

Photographers, in particular, were instrumental in discovering this land. At that time, Palestine was populated by only 300,000 persons. In addition to the Muslim Arab majority, Palestine was home to various Christian sects and a handful of Jews, most of whom were indigent and relied on overseas charity.

On Jan. 29, the work of these intrepid photographers will be exhibited at the Santa Barbara Museum of Art in California. The exhibit is scheduled to run until May 31. A glossy book, filled with text and photographs, has been published to coincide with it. Revealing the Holy Land: The Photographic Exploration of Palestine is distributed by the University of California Press.

The earliest photographers to ply their craft in Palestine were French and British, pioneers like Frederic Goupil-Fesquet, Pierre-Gustave Joly de Lotbiniere, George Wilson Bridges, James Robertson, Maxime Du Camp, Auguste Salzmann and James McDonald. They labored under difficult conditions, using the primitive daguerreotype process, but they have much to show for their efforts. Their photographs are at once evocative and enduring, timeless impressions in amber, as it were.

Leafing through the pages of this attractive volume, I was struck by a number of photographs: Du Camp's view of Jerusalem's outer walls, McDonald's panoramic vista of the city from the Hill of the Evil Counsel, and Robertson's study of Jews praying at the Western Wall.

I was also impressed by McDonald's series on the desolate but achingly beautiful Sinai Peninsula.

All in all, these are photographs on which to linger and reflect.

Students speak out on religion

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

A few years ago, teenagers in a religious day school in a large U.S. city were asked to talk about religion and their feelings regarding their religious upbringing. Here is a composite of their reactions.

"I really don't believe that any religious group has the right to tell people how to run their lives. There are just too many things that are hard for me to accept as far as the rules of the religion go. No matter how hard they try and push the faith upon me, it has to come from within myself, so I wish they'd stop pushing."

Some comments go even further. "The religion is an anachronistic dried out medieval society in the 20th and 21st centuries. To preach it in modern society is difficult, humiliating and rarely well done." Or this thought: "I think of the tradition as mental slavery for immature people."

And the response of the teachers of these children was equally revealing. Here's one example: "Adolescents these days question all sources of authority. This generation of kids, especially in the last few years, really has knowledgeable parents, so they are more sophisticated. They get it from their parents. By all means, the tendency is toward questioning and not swallowing something just because you're told to.

You know, it's like they're saying "Anytime an authority figure asks me to do something I'll ask why. You prove it to me." Our job as religious teachers is not just to present but to persuade these days. We're selling more than telling."

Does this sound familiar? Some of these comments, even the harsh ones, seem to aptly represent many Jewish children and teenagers, some that are frustrated and bored in day schools and in afternoon Hebrew schools that follow public school. But there's one important qualification to make here. All of these comments were made by Catholics about Catholicism.

Jewish communities should realize that we are not alone in the struggle to transmit a religious tradition to our children. When I was a professor of English literature at the University of Toronto, I was often struck by how little of the Christian Bible students were familiar with, and thus how many biblical allusions in works by say, Milton or Shakespeare, passed right by them. Now I don't expect that is particularly comforting for Jewish parents, to know that others face the same problem that we do. But the fact is that rebellion against authority and alienation from traditional religious teachings is a common problem in much of the Western world.

The price that we pay for living in an open liberal democratic society is that our children are thrust out into

Rabbinic Reflections

Jacob's still intriguing

By RABBI RON AIGEN

Jacob's career is most intriguing to us, perhaps because he seems the most human of the patriarchs. Jacob is "everyman;" he displays the same human foibles many of us experience – deceit, anger and fear. And yet, it is Jacob who becomes the heroic "Israel," the one who wrestles with both human and Divine and prevails.

Jacob thus represents for us the patriarch with whom we can most readily identify. He is neither Abraham, the first generation spiritual giant, nor Isaac, the second generation descendant whose identity is forever overshadowed by his parents' generation. Jacob is his own person, humanly flawed but striving for spiritual greatness.

In this week's Torah portion, Vayetzei, Jacob is leaving home. This is a major move in Jacob's life, and as with all such transitions, there is some fear of the unknown and anxiety about the future. Jacob's story holds importance to us, both individually and collectively, for the wisdom it can impart about facing the future.

Jacob sets out to find a place for himself in the world, and that idea is highlighted by the use of the Hebrew word makom (place) three times in the second verse of our portion. "He came upon a certain place and stopped there for the night, for the sun had set. Taking one of stones of that place, he put it under his head and lay down in that place."

According to Rashi, the sun had not yet set, but nevertheless Jacob felt darkness all around him. Jacob's search for place is clearly understood to be a spiritual quest, leading him back to the place toward which his ancestors Abraham and Isaac had set out together, Mt. Moriah. "On the third day Abraham looked up and saw the place from afar." (Gen. 22:3-4)

As he sets out to find his own place in the world, Jacob first gains his bearings by reconnecting with the spiritual grounding of his father and grandfather. Only this kind of place can dispel the darkness he experiences.

In addition to alluding to the site of the Akedah, Hamakom, the rabbinic imagination connotes another name for God – The Ground of Being. Clearly, Jacob is in search of more than just another place to rest his head.

The emphasis upon place reaches a climax at the conclusion of the well-known dream sequence of Jacob's ladder which now follows. That ladder reaches up to heaven, with angels ascending and descending. What a wonderful metaphor for a spiritual quest.

Remember that Jacob is running away from his brother Esau, perhaps self-doubting, perhaps fearful. But he dreams of reaching to heaven. Jacob is a spiritual climber! We notice, however, that Jacob's ladder is planted firmly on the ground and that the angels are first going up, before they descend from heaven. Furthermore, when Jacob awakens, God is standing right there next to him.

It is as if to say that his true spiritual strength, his Ground of Being, Hamakom, is always right there beside him. "Surely the Eternal One is present in this place, and I did not know it! He was afraid, and he said, 'How awesome is this place.' And he named that place Bethel."

But even after he had discovered God's presence, Jacob was afraid. What exactly did he fear? Noting that the divine beings first ascended from earth before they came down from the heavens, the rabbis created several midrashic legends by way of explanation.

The angels, say the rabbis, were the spirit of the nations, Babylonia, Persia, Greece and Rome. Each of these nations ascended as political powers but then suffered defeat. Jacob, according to this rabbinic legend, fears that he (Israel), too, will disappear from history. God tells him in the dream that if you never climb the ladder, you will never know whether or not you will succeed. Jacob, fearing the risk of failure, chooses not to ascend.

The legend then concludes with a rebuke from God. "Had you ascended and believed, you would have succeeded. Since you did not have faith, your children will be enslaved by these four kingdoms."

"Forever?" asks Jacob.

"No, you will not be completely destroyed. I will eventually redeem you from exile."

The midrashim of the rabbis are powerful legends because they convey to us the eternal concerns that we share as a people. Which generation of Jews has not been concerned with its continued survival?

What the rabbis convey to us in their interpretation of Jacob's dream is that we too should be spiritual climbers. We too share in the dream of Jacob's ladder. Individually and collectively, there are still higher rungs in the ladder for us to climb. We all have the ability to grow in our relationships with others, as well as in our relationships with other peoples. Knowing that God is at our side, we too can climb the rungs of spiritual greatness, that "all the families of the earth might bless themselves by us and our descendants."

Rabbi Aigen is spiritual leader of Congregation Dorshei Emet – the Reconstructionist synagogue of Montreal.

A rallying cry for unity

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Chanukah is celebrated this month, and rather than focus on one aspect of the holiday, perhaps it is important to take an overview.

Israel was being oppressed religiously and politically within her borders. One family rose to leadership and called out: "Whoever is for God should join me!" It was this battle-cry that united the people into one force and they battled to victory, liberating the land and the Temple.

One could look at this miracle and feel that it is of "biblical proportion," since the odds were so overwhelming. Even more, the Israelites managed to unite into one army with no apparent dissension.

It seems as if God stepped in, united the people and led them to victory. However, even in the Bible, God joins Israel in battle but rarely battles alone. We are expected to contribute in the best way possible and only then are miracles performed. With this in mind, it is interesting to notice the battle-cry issued by the Hasmoneans. They did not screen their army; they did not cry "whoever understands Torah as I do..." or "whoever prays using my version..." Rather, they said, "whoever is for God..."

You might assume that Israel had no issues of multiple groups at that time in history. You would be wrong. We know of no time in our history when there was only one interpretation of Torah with no arguments or serious political diversity. Yet, at that moment, the Hasmoneans have a clear understanding that the nation needs an outcry of commonality. The bottom line is that all Jews are monotheists recognizing the one true God.

Balance is maintained in the holiday of Chanukah when the rabbis of the Talmud designate both a male and a female leader. Judah the Maccabee fought in the front lines and Judith fought behind enemy lines. God enters the holiday through the miracle of the victory and the lights of the menorah that burned for eight days.

Light is very significant in Judaism and one of the things it symbolizes is knowledge and understanding. If one brings this understanding to the miracle of Chanukah, what is the knowledge gained through this holiday? Perhaps it is the understanding of unity and balance that is so wonderfully portrayed in the leadership and battle cry.

Interestingly, the Torah readings this month show us a glimpse of the opposite. Jacob marries two sisters, Leah and Rachel, but only one is loved, Rachel. When the women begin giving birth, the parental issues are incorporated into their children's names. The first born is named Reuven because "God saw my pain;" the second is Shimon because "God heard my affliction." Almost every child bears a statement of disloyalty or suffering within their name. It is these children that grow to plan fratricide against their brother Joseph.

The Jewish people today face difficult challenges of continuity and unity. We must take note of the example in Genesis showing us what can result from internal bitterness. Somewhere in today's arguments about pluralism and authority, it would be refreshing to hear a Jewish leader cry out for our commonality: "Whoever is for God..."

How to find a well run charity

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

So many worthy causes. So little money.

You'll find many of them on the Jewish Highway. I couldn't possibly list even a fraction of them. Nor would I dare recommend one over another.

However, I would like to examine a few sites and give suggestions about how to give and what to look for in a well-run charity. Thankfully, there are a few people who research charities (many of which are not well known) and recommend the ones that are truly making a difference.

First, a few words of caution. There are many worthwhile charitable institutions on the Internet. However, I strongly advise further investigation before you donate. If a charitable donation receipt is important to you, find out whether one is available before you give.

Finally, there is much debate about whether you should send a credit card donation on line. If you are hesitant, no charity would turn down a donation by mail.

One of the most incredible advocates of tzedakah is mitzvah maven Danny Siegel. Siegel is based in Rockville, Md. and operates the Ziv Tzedakah Fund Inc. [http://www.feduja.org/commserv/organize/1129.stm].

Siegel likes to proclaim his "Mitzvah Heroes" such as Elana Erdstein from Detroit, who requested and received for her bat mitzvah 25,000 hotel-size soaps, shampoos and conditioners to be given to the poor. Or John Beltzer, who writes personalized songs for children with cancer.

You can read an article about how Siegel likes to go dumpster dipping looking for good merchandise which has been thrown out at [http://www.jewish.com/bk970919/ebmaven.htm].

Similar to Ziv, Kavod [http://www.kavod.com] describes itself as a Nebraska-based "non-profit tzedakah collective." Kavod's "goal is to enable our beneficiaries to live in dignity and honor by funding and creating programs that provide for their material, physical, emotional, intellectual, and spiritual well-being...We strive to operate as close to zero percent overhead as possible and to support programs which demand the same efficiency."

Unfortunately, there is no on-line independent assessment of major Jewish charities and the work they do. Tzedakah Reports [http://www.landaus.com/tzedakah/] seems to provide that service for a few. A sample of its work for the National Yiddish Book Centre is found at [http://www.landaus.com/tzedakah/sample.htm]. The Internet Nonprofit Centre [http://www.nonprofits.org/] provides information about American charities [http://www.nonprofits.org/gallery/search.shtml]. I couldn't find a similar service for Canadian or Israeli-based charities. If you know of one, please e-mail me.

As we've seen, there are many ethical and practical questions surrounding tzedakah.

Yosef Ben Shlomo Hakohen offers a monthly correspondence course by e-mail on the mitzvah of tzedakah [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/jerbooks/tzedakah.htm]. Issues to be studied include why the Torah considers tzedakah to be both an act of love and an act of justice; and does Jewish tradition favor government involvement with regard to the prevention of poverty?

If you have an insight or problem you want to share, you can start a discussion at the Liberal Judaism Category Index: Tzedakah and Tikkun Olam [http://silk.compclass.com/mlj/category/c58.html]. And, of course, don't forget the [news:soc.culture.jewish] newsgroup.

Still looking for more? Try these Tzedakah Links [http://www.ajritz.com/jew/tzedlnk.htm], The Jewish Theological Seminary's Giving Page [http://www.jtsa.edu/melton/tzedaka/] Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx172.htm], Major Resources for Making Decisions [http://www.jtsa.edu/melton/tzedaka/resources.html] and Be a Friend, Lend a Hand [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/friend/index.htm].

Next week, we'll continue by looking at some sites which help foster the duty and love of tzedakah in children.

Despite setbacks, Israeli economy thriving

Diplomatically Speaking
By JEHUDI KINAR

I have just returned from a ten-day visit to Israel. It is always good to recharge the batteries, although they were still energized from my visit in August this year.

In Israel, there is a certain feeling of disappointment that the peace process is not moving, but we cannot rush to a solution in matters of such gravity. Too much is at risk and we must be cautious, rather than hasty, in trying to keep to the timetable for negotiations.

On a cheerier note, one can't help but notice that the Israeli economy is booming. Construction and the opening of franchises of international chains are apparent everywhere. The consumer's market is thriving. Israel's gross domestic product per capita already surpasses that of some of the members of the European Union.

For immigrants, Israel is becoming increasingly attractive for economic, and not just for the traditional nationalistic or religious reasons.

Meeting with Canadian media correspondents, I tried to interest them in the upcoming year of events celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary. For once it would be nice to divert the media's attention from political to more cultural and social issues. But since the Canadian Minister of External Affairs, Lloyd Axworthy, had just arrived in the country, media attention was focused on his visit and on the "passport episode" a couple of weeks earlier.

Another issue that was raised by the Canadian correspondents was the conversion law and their interest in finding out more about Canadian Jews' attitudes towards this issue. This legislation has not been subjected to much public scrutiny in Israel because of the more pressing domestic concerns of most Israelis, who must deal daily with critical issues like security and livelihood.

We do realize, however, that this is an urgent issue for North American Jews, and their concerns must be addressed. The committee led by the Israeli Finance Minister Yaacov Neeman is looking into this very question and will have some answers by the end of January 1998.

It was striking how much emphasis was put on this issue during the last General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations.

Public not scrutinizing conversion issue

At this same General Assembly, I participated in a discussion of the Israel Experience program and was happy to learn about the program's positive effects, not only for Israel, but especially for the Jewish community abroad.

The Israel Experience is sponsored by a number of Jewish organizations, and brings young people who are often not affiliated to Jewish schools or organizations to Israel for extended visits in a variety of settings. This program shows again that a visit or stay in Israel serves to strengthen, not only individual, but community links with Israel. Academic studies, which have researched the results and implications of the Israel Experience, confirmed these assessments.

Coming back to the 50th anniversary of Israel, I hope that many of you will be able to join us Tuesday Dec. 23 to light the first candle of Chanukah, and launch the festivities for this anniversary. One of the best ways to experience the exciting events planned for the 50th anniversary celebrations is to join the UJA mission to Israel from Feb. 23 to March 4.

the secular west, attempting to weld together their Jewish souls on the assembly-line of cultural schlock that inundates, not only North America, but a great deal of the world today.

But rebellion as a permanent posture can only take a person so far. The late Abbie Hoffman, when queried by the judge in the Chicago Seven trial about his place of residence, answered "Woodstock." When the judge asked "what state is that in?" Hoffman replied. "Your Honor, that's a state of mind."

Perhaps the greatest challenge that the contemporary religious educator faces is to keep faith with the student, to recognize that alienation is not necessarily a permanent address. As we are told in Deuteronomy, Ch. 30, "the Torah is not in heaven…nor is it beyond the sea. But the word is very near to you, in your mouth and in your heart." Consciousness, as the doomed Hoffman nicely perceived, is portable, something the Torah understood all along.

Givat Haviva promotes peace between Israeli, Arab students

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After almost 50 years, Givat Haviva, an Israeli centre that promotes dialogue, peace and coexistence, is still going strong.

Shuli Dichter, co-director of Children Teaching Children, a program of Givat Haviva that matches up Israel and Arab students, said the centre was established in 1949 in order to face the problems in a newly born Israel.

"Now, it is a combination of four centres that runs programs for the combined population of Arabs and Jews who live in the area – between Tel Aviv and Haifa, near the Green Line."

Dichter spoke recently at St. Gabriel's Parish in a program co-sponsored by Canadian Friends of Givat Haviva and the parish.

Givat Haviva includes an art centre, which caters to adults and children; a centre for Holocaust remembrance, which studies the role of Jewish youth during the Holocaust and offers courses on racism to Jews and Arabs; a video centre, which teaches videography and media; and the largest centre, the Jewish-Arab Centre for Peace.

"Children Teaching Children is part of the Centre for Peace. For children taking part in that program, it is, for the most part, the first time they have talked to their neighbors," Dichter said.

The program, now celebrating its 10th anniversary, has two directors, one Jewish and one Arab. Children Teaching Children, Dichter said, grew out of a desire to improve the relationship between Jewish and Palestinian citizens of Israel. The program's goals include developing skills and abilities required by Jews and Arabs to live within the Jewish-Arab conflict in Israel; participating in dialogue based on well-grounded personal and group identities; working in a supportive classroom setting that facilitates and promotes personal and collective change; developing a more critical perspective of the complex reality within which the participants live.

The program, he said, involves pairing classes from Arab and Jewish schools less than 20 minutes apart by bus. Students work in groups of 10 to 15 and over a two year period, two hours per week are devoted to the program.

Asked if any parents disapproved of their child's taking part in the program, Dichter said that "most do not have any objection to the project outright, but even those who support peace, have trouble dealing with it. An Arab parent may say he supports peace, but it is difficult when his child comes home and says, 'They took our land but so what?' When a Jewish child asks if his parent expelled Arabs from their village in 1948, it is difficult to understand. Very few parents, however, have asked that the program not be run."

Speaking about conflicts in general, Dichter said that taking sides actually has a life impact. "Taking sides means that the conflict is part of our life and that is an emotional issue. Conflicts cause people to make certain decisions such as where to live, where to go to university and whether to marry. Belonging to one side or the other does not, however, mean that we do not understand the other side, but it does mean that we belong to the other side."

People take sides, he said, because of an urge to belong. "At Givat Haviva, we try to recognize conflict, and teach people to bring up their emotions and come to terms with them."

B'not mitzvah mark celebrations

Latner donates to Zareinu

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Yael Latner was in Grade 6 at Bialik Hebrew Day School, her class went on a trip to Zareinu, a school for multiple challenged children. She was impressed by the work the staff does, and realized that they needed equipment so that they could accomplish even more.

She was so impressed that she asked that all her bat mitzvah gifts be directed to Zareinu.

Recently, Rebecca Anisman, age four, presented Yael with a plaque on behalf of the staff and students, to thank her for her generosity. The special ceremony also featured a special song in her honor, sung by kindergarten students at the school.

School co-principal Carol Goldman said that while they are grateful for the time and financial support adults have given the school, "I can honestly say that nothing has touched our hearts as much as Yael's decision to donate all her bat mitzvah gifts to help the children of Zareinu in their struggle for mobility, communication and independence."

Yael, now in Grade 8 at Bialik, told The CJN that she hopes to be able to do volunteer work at Zareinu when she attends CHAT next year. She already helps out at Mount Sinai Hospital events.

Yael was following a family tradition by donating her bat mitzvah gifts to a worthy cause. Her older sister, Lily, donated hers to Operation Exodus, and her brother Jack gave his to Reena.

The money went for occupational therapy equipment, specialized tests and activities, adapted material in both Hebrew and English, and additional therapy hours, said Goldman.

Goldman said that the school now has 45 students, a considerable increase since last year. "Because of government cutbacks, people have less access to government services and therapy," she said, explaining why so many more people are turning to Zareinu.

Yael Latner hugs almost-four-year-old Jesse Tater, as she holds the plaque thanking her for donating her bat mitzvah gifts to Zareinu. Sister Phoebe, 10, looks on. [Leila Speisman photo]

Banack shares her simchah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For her recent bat mitzvah, Hailey Banack followed a nascent family tradition, sharing her simchah in a most unusual way.

Two years ago, for his bar mitzvah, Hailey's brother Adam "twinned" with a Holocaust victim, Shmuel Eisen, who died in Auschwitz at age 12. The twinning, arranged with the help of the Holocaust Memorial & Education Centre, made the occasion even more meaningful and led to an ongoing relationship with Holocaust survivor Max Eisen, Shmuel's brother.

For Hailey's bat mitzvah at Beth Sholom Synagogue, the family contacted the Reena Foundation, which works with adults who have developmental disabilities.

Since the spring, Hailey, a Grade 7 student at Bialik Hebrew Day School, has been spending time on a volunteer basis with Rachel Samuels, 28, who has Down Syndrome.

Hailey and a friend visit Rachel – a TV wrestling aficionado – and her roommate every week to do things together like baking brownies or playing games. The two women live in a Reena apartment with support from Reena staff.

Rachel had never celebrated her bat mitzvah. Her Jewish education began only at age 15, when she joined Marla and Howard Gertz' family as a foster child. Living in an observant home, attending Camp Shalom, Kadimah School and National Conference of Synagogue Youth (where Howard Gertz, a special education teacher, runs classes), and visiting Israel have contributed to Rachel's strong sense of Jewish identity.

Hailey's bat mitzvah, like her brother's bar mitzvah, became a shared simchah – Rachel sang the blessings in Hebrew, having learned them from her foster parents, and Hailey read the maftir as Rachel stayed on the bimah with her.

"We shared our bat mitzvah together. I loved that," said Rachel.

At the rehearsal, Rachel had given an enthusiastic thumbs-up sign to the rabbi's announcement that she would read the blessings. The following week, at the service, she did "an amazing job," said her foster mother.

"I feel happy," Rachel said. "The shul is wonderful and I go for it."

Hailey, whose extracurricular activities include swimming and pottery, has gained a great deal from her association with Rachel, Hailey's mother Arna says. "I think it's given her insights into a whole world she didn't know a lot about."

"It's also an opportunity for her brother and [younger] sister and us, to learn and become more sensitive about the world," added Hailey's father Larry.

Hailey's initial nervousness dissipated once she met Rachel. "I learned a whole bunch about a certain way of life, that not everyone is perfect. There's nothing to be afraid of in people like Rachel. I learned that Rachel is a lot of fun to be with and play with."

The Jewish community still has a long way to go to integrate people with special needs, said Marla Gertz. She feels the shared bat mitzvah will increase awareness within the community and hopes it will inspire other families to follow the Banacks' example.

Larry, who like his wife is active in the community – he has served on the board of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS); she is involved in UJA/Federation – said people don't appreciate how much foster parents like the Gertzes give back. "Those of us involved in JF&CS or Reena may have a glimmer."

He credited Hailey for her one-on-one volunteer work. "It would be really helpful [for adult volunteers] to take off our ties and jackets and work with Hailey and make brownies and understand. It's easy to be on a board, but it's not easy to have the insight of the effect of your decisions."

Thornhill IGA gets kosher kitchen

The kosher scene in Toronto is exciting, partly because new kosher establishments are always opening up and appear to be staying.

This is the first in a series of three articles on what's new in kashrut in the Greater Toronto area.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

KASHRUT FRONT

TORONTO — Bet you didn't know that you can get kosher Kentucky-style fried chicken. Well, now you can, at the newly renovated IGA supermarket at Clark and Hilda in Thornhill.

The upgraded store opened officially last Sunday with a mezuzzah-affixing ceremony, give-aways, cake, flowers for the ladies, coffee, musicians, and "really good specials" according to Kevin Hopps, who has been store manager for the past three years.

One of the innovations, says Harry Guest, consultant to Oshawa Foods, the owner of IGA, is a kosher kitchen, which will turn out a line of kosher prepared foods, including vegetable dishes, twice-baked potatoes, salads — and Kentucky-style fried chicken.

All the changes have made the store look much bigger and brighter, Hopps said. The fresh produce department has been moved beside the kosher department, the frozen food cases and dairy products are on the northern side of the store, and there is a much enlarged fresh flowers section.

But the biggest changes are to the kosher department, which has about doubled in size. There are greatly expanded deli, fish, and kosher frozen food cases, a large kosher dairy aisle, and many special display stands of kosher specials.

There are now five aisle sides of kosher groceries, as opposed to four, and there has been a real attempt to bring in more products and product lines, according to Guest and Hopps.

Guest told The CJN that he has been trying to encourage Canadian food manufacturers and processors to get kosher certification, from COR in Ontario and MK in Quebec.

This would not only make more foods available to the kosher consumer, but, Guest said, would result in lower prices.

The IGA kosher meat department, said Guest, is one of the few supermarket kosher meat sections that have their own butchers on staff, so that customers can ask for whatever cuts they want.

Guest proudly pointed out a new oven in the bakery section, which will produce fresh kosher breads all day long. As well, the cake decorators will be working in plain sight of the customers.

Hopps and Guest noted that there are many more kosher products available under the IGA and Our Compliments labels than there used to be.

The whole idea, according to Hopps, is to best serve the local community, with selection, service and the best prices possible.

"We have the largest variety of kosher food in one shop in Canada," he said, adding that "we are committed to bringing the cost of kosher [food] down."

That is not to say, he noted, that the regular grocery, meat and dairy sections in the 43,000 square foot store are shortchanged — they too are upgraded and freshened up.

IGA is owned by Oshawa Foods, which has just changed its corporate name to Agora Food Merchants. According to a recent publicity folder, the new name "symbolizes the transformation of Oshawa's retail and wholesale food operations from three regions and eight divisions into one unified, national retail food support company."

Doing the 'write thing' at the General Assembly

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As editor of Images, Toronto's Jewish student newspaper, I was sent to Indiana for the Council of Jewish Federation's (CJF) General Assembly from Nov. 14 to 19. There I was one of about 250 students among the 4,500 delegates.

BACKGROUNDER

I also took part in a unique program held simultaneously with the General Assembly and called Do The Write Thing. It's specifically geared toward Jewish student journalists. This year, there were 40 North American students in Do The Write Thing – two from Images.

The purpose was to expose students to professional Jewish journalists (such as the editors of the Jewish Week, JTA, Moment magazine, Jerusalem Report and Lilith magazine) and to give the students an opportunity to discuss technical skills.

In one skill training session, the students were paired up with media experts from the American Jewish press to discuss and analyze a piece of writing that the students had submitted.

Toward the end of the conference, I was asked, along with three other student editors, to be on a panel to discuss some of the problems and solutions involved in running a Jewish campus publication. We each offered ideas on how to build and make a better publication. Questions to the panel ranged from Have you ever received articles by (anti-Semitic) self-hating Jews? to What constitutes Jewish content?

I also felt fortunate to be included on a panel of five editors chosen to collectively write a manual for future editors on how to run a publication smoothly.

Some of the highlights of the General Assembly were the opportunities to be up close to see Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak (Labor Opposition leader) speak to the delegates.

In my opinion, one of the most poignant things Netanyahu said was, "There is no such thing as a second class Jew."

Students then had the chance to be included in exclusive press conferences. The conference moderator for Barak even made a point of reserving question time for Do The Write Thing participants.

Noa packs auditorium

Another highlight was the concert by Noa (Israeli pop singer Achinoam Nini). She performed in front of a crowd that had quickly packed the auditorium. In the middle of the concert, many students began to dance in front of the stage.

Although many students admitted to not knowing who she was before the concert, they were fans by the end of the concert. I had the unique opportunity to see Noa backstage, had my picture taken with her and asked her to sign an autograph.

The program also allowed the students to attend a speech made by President Bill Clinton via satellite, watch greetings from an astronaut on space-station Mir, meet Ehud Ya'ari (correspondent for Israeli TV, Channel 1), hear Dennis Prager (author, talk show host), see Dore Gold (Israel's ambassador to the United Nations) and enjoy a concert by Jewish folksinger Debbie Friedman.

I returned from the General Assembly with many new ideas, inspired by the host of speakers, especially moved by what Ehud Barak said when I met him after his speech: "I have to see these students. They are the future. And the future is important."

Jewish law students convention set

LOS ANGELES — The National Jewish Law Students Association (NJLSA) in the United States will hold its 16th annual convention from March 6 to 9, 1998, at the USC School of Law in Los Angeles, Calif.

The convention's theme is Jewish Choices and Legal Challenges for the 21st Century.

Legal figures who have expressed interest in coming include Alan Dershowitz, Elliot Abrams, Erwin Chemerinsky and Laurie Levenson.

Bruce Einhorn, who before his appointment to the bench, prosecuted war criminals for the Department of Justice, will be the keynote speaker.

California Supreme Court Justice Stanley Mosk will be presented with the Justice Brandeis award for a career committed to social justice.

Issues to be discussed will include race relations, conflicting definitions of Jewish identity, current topics in entertainment law, alternative dispute resolution with the beit din, the status of women in Jewish law and practical strategies for maintaining a Jewish identity in the workplace.

The convention is organized by law students from the six Los Angeles and Orange County area law schools.

Education, welfare cutbacks slammed

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Cuts in education and welfare spending will have devastating consequences, speakers at a conference titled In Search of Common Sense in the Common Sense Revolution warned.

The one-day conference at Temple Anshe Sholom opened with an analysis by Judge Marvin A. Zuker of the Ontario Court of Justice, provincial division, of the provincial government's proposed education bill, and its impact on Ontario's education system.

An author, educator and associate professor at the University of Toronto, Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, Zuker said the proposed restructured elementary and high school curricula, will "effectively eliminate" junior kindergarten and adult education.

The preschool period, he explained, "is the period of the most rapid learning," and education provided by day-care centres and junior kindergarten "prevents anti-social behavior and later crime rate."

As a family court judge, Zuker sees the results of "no education, no welfare, no support and nowhere to go," every day in court.

Reduced spending for adult education will deprive adults over 21 of continuing education,while special needs children will also suffer as a result of spending cuts, he said.

"One can, and should, criticize any reduction in education funding," Zuker said. "If we begin to treat education as a commodity," he warned, "we run the risk of losing our future."

Viewing the Tory agenda from a Jewish religious perspective, keynote speaker, Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple, warned of the Common Sense Revolution's "very far-reaching repercussions on the very fabric of society;" of what happens "when religion is relegated to the private sector realm and G-d sense is banished from common sense."

Tzedakah, he said, means charity, but tzedek means justice, and while the government's goal of deficit reduction is in itself laudable, it is "legitimate and just only when pursued by just means."

He characterized the Torys' philosophy as "what is mine, is mine, and what is your is yours, and why should the government take more of mine?"

Voluntary sharing of wealth with the poor and weak is charity, but to provide for their needs through compulsory taxation is justice, said Rabbi Marmur.

Government spending cuts "are likely to do untold damage to society for many years to come. If you don't have power, you make noise. It's about all we can do," he said.

Rabbi Marmur was introduced and thanked by Temple Anshe Sholom's rabbi emeritus, Rabbi Bernard Baskin. Opening remarks were by conference coordinator, Dr. Ronnie Miller, Anshe Sholom director of education. Dr. Anthony MaFarlane, president, and Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz also spoke briefly.

Rabbis explore religious differences

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Three local rabbis amicably discussed the differences in their respective movements at a recent symposium sponsored by the McMaster Jewish Student Association (MJSA).

Jewish continuity, said Orthodox Rabbi William Z. Eisenstein, principal of the Hamilton Hebrew Academy, depends on knowledge, a Jewish family life, an active religious life, a sense of belonging and creativity.

While education is the key, knowledge alone, he said, is not enough. Parents have to set an example by living an active religious life themselves and "not just paying lip service to religion. You have to start when children are very young, so that it's natural to be Jewish.

"Orthodoxy is an active religion and when you put all this together," said Rabbi Eisenstein "you have the freedom to be creative."

Rabbi Gary Karlin, spiritual leader of Beth Jacob Congregation, agreed, but added that Conservative Judaism, once the largest movement in North American Judaism, is today "the most misunderstood movement in Judaism."

Conservative Judaism, he said, takes a pluralistic view of Judaism. It sees itself as being part of Torah obligation and the commandments. "We believe that Halachah (Jewish law) has always developed and needs to develop in the future, [and] that Halachah has to include women. There has to be an evaluation of the law," said Rabbi Karlin, "and we have to figure out how these changes can be implemented."

Conservative Judaism "believes in halachic continuity, intellectual creativity and observance of mitzvot."

"We all have something to learn from each other," said Rabbi Karlin.

While "there may be some looseness in Reform Judaism," Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Temple Anshe Sholom said, "Reform never denied the Torah. There is a tremendous emphasis today on study. We believe in kedushah, Holiness," adding that "this is sometimes difficult to understand."

Reform, said Rabbi Zeplowitz, "emphasizes klal Israel. We are part of the community and we have a responsibility to the greater community."

Furthermore, Reform "has fully embraced women in Judaism and we also believe in outreach to other faiths and minorities.

"Central to continuity is much more what we share than what we don't share."

Parizeau's comments anger Jewish groups

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec's two main Jewish groups were respectively angry and dismissive after former premier Jacques Parizeau, for the first time last week, said he was talking about the Jewish, Italian and Greek federalist coalition when he blamed "money and ethnics" for the narrow referendum loss two years ago.

The coalition also issued a statement "strongly denouncing" Parizeau's remarks.

And MNA Christos Sirros, Liberal critic for intercultural relations, failed in a bid to get the National Assembly to pass a motion condemning Parizeau's "incendiary and accusatory" remarks.

"It's reprehensible," Jack Jedwab, director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), said of Parizeau's comments in an interview.

"His motivation was obviously pernicious. It smacks of the obvious demagoguery of Mr. Parizeau, whose obvious objective is to further aggravate divisions between Quebecers and Canadians in general."

Allan Adel, Quebec chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, said people "should rightly condemn where he [Parizeau] is coming from."

But Adel also suggested that the former premier has lost so much credibility that his remarks weren't worth commenting on.

"My reaction is that Parizeau is old news and irrelevant," Adel said in an interview.

"I don't much like what he says but I don't take it too seriously. He is no longer premier and no longer a player. I don't think what he has to say counts very much."

In the coalition statement, Italian congress president Tony Manglaviti accused Parizeau of repeating his remarks of two years ago.

At the time, the remarks were "reprehensible and fundamentally anti-democratic, and the interpretation he is currently giving to his words is nothing but demagoguery."

The statement also quoted Hellenic Congress vice-president Athanasios Hadjis and CJC-Q chair Reisa Teitelbaum.

But Parizeau's most recent reference to the coalition, made during a two-day swing through Alberta, was not the first time he has singled it out.

In 1993, Parizeau created a stir by suggesting that separatist forces did not need ethnic backing to achieve independence because there was enough support for the cause coming from Quebec francophones.

At the time, Parizeau defended himself by saying it was the Jewish, Italian and Greek coalition, by the act of coalescing, that was framing the unity debate in ethnic terms and driving members of their communities to vote against separation en masse.

Jedwab and Teitelbaum, however, said in the statement that the coalition has consistently addressed itself to all Quebecers and Canadians.

"It's always been clear we're not just speaking to our respective communities," he said. "Our agenda has been dictated by the memberships of our communities and not the inverse."

B'nai Brith vice-president Stephen Scheinberg, also reacting last week to Parizeau, was quoted as saying that the former premier was attempting an "evasion" by suggesting his referendum remarks were directed at ethnic organizations and not their members.

"Now he's conjuring up some kind of illusion of ethnic power in these congresses," he said. "Organizations of this sort have very little power over their memberships and have very little money."

Hate crimes unit launched

By MELANIE COLLISON
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Other cities have shown Calgary that the more multicultural a city becomes, the more potential there is for its cultural elements to clash — and the more sensitive its police service has to be in dealing with crimes motivated by hate or bias against minorities.

Add to that the autumn 1996 amendment to the Criminal Code that directs judges to dole out harsher sentences to criminals motivated by bias, prejudice or hate, and the result is the establishment of the Hate/ Bias Crimes Unit in the Calgary Police Service.

"The partnership of the police with the community in dealing with hate/bias crimes is really important," says Const. Russ Pouliotte, head of the unit — and its only member so far. "The Calgary Police Service is progressive in what we're doing. This is policing in the '90s."

The origins of the Hate/Bias Crime Units goes back to the early 1980s, says Hal Joffe, national chair of the community relations committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, who has acted as a community consultant to the unit.

The Criminal Code does not make it a specific offence to commit a crime motivated by hate/bias. Some jurisdictions have decided to monitor only those crimes where hate/bias is the primary factor. Calgary has chosen to monitor crimes where any part of the motivation is hate or bias. Such crimes increase when economic times are bad.

"It's important because our community is constantly changing," Joffe says. "It is not the harmonious community it was 50 years ago.

"The police have to be able to address their investigation from the point of view of those who are witnesses and those who are providing information."

"I think the alertness the Jewish community brings into this mix is starting to spread to other community groups. The rest of the population is catching up, as we grow in terms of nationalities and mix in our larger centres," Pouliotte adds.

The police service went to the community to find out what qualities people wanted to find in the officers who attended a crime scene, and researched what is done in other cities, particularly in the United States, where the federal government mandated collection information on hate/bias crimes in 1990.

A committee of 20 Calgarians, including Joffe and Riki Heilik, community relations director for Calgary Jewish Community Council, was consulted a year ago. The committee includes members of many targeted communities, including Muslims, senior citizens and disabled people.

A trainer was brought in from Chicago to train 90 supervisory people to recognize hate/bias crimes as they review field personnel's reports. They in turn educate field personnel.

These supervisors are also trained to ensure that any hate/bias element of a crime is noted in the crime report, since those documents are read in court. They record the perception of both the police officer and the victim.

The police have been recording incidents since June 1, and by September had identified 27 incidents related to race, and nine related to sexual preferences. Pouliotte gets a 24-hour reading of all reports each morning. Assaults and threats led the types of crimes.

Reform discussed 'options' against Israel: Manning

Despite recent Canadian support for a UN resolution that condemned Israel, Axworthy defended Canada's UN voting record. He said Canada recently voted against another measure calling for Israel's censure for its nuclear program.

In view of his recent success in getting so many countries to sign a treaty banning the use and production of land mines, Axworthy said Canada is redefining its foreign policy to include other "human security issues" like terrorism, drugs, public health and environmental concerns.

Preston Manning

After outlining the Reform party's plans for keeping Canada united, leader Preston Manning found himself fending off charges that Reform had sought sanctions against Israel following the passport affair.

Included in the UJA participants' kits was an Oct. 6 letter from the Canada-Israel Committee to Manning, taking the party to task for statements made by its foreign affairs critic, Bob Mills.

Mills had been quoted as saying Canada should seek visa, trade and intelligence sanctions against Israel for using faked Canadian passports in the botched Mossad bid to assassinate a Hamas leader in Amman.

Manning, who did not respond to the letter, explained that the party neither proposed nor supports sanctions. He said the measures Mills had discussed were merely options and not recommendations.

Reform was kept in the dark because there was no information for a week following the arrest of the two Mossad agents. Manning said that in the future, the government should provide the Opposition with confidential briefings on what it knows.

Manning said Reform supports Israel's right to existence, development and self-determination.

Asked about a recent published letter from Reform MP Ted White defending newspaper columnist Doug Collins, who questions the Holocaust, Manning said White was likely defending Collins' freedom of speech.

Several years ago, Manning said he refused to sign nomination papers for Collins, who was seeking a Reform seat in Vancouver, after Collins refused to sign a statement renouncing discrimination.

"I know the type of character Collins is. He's exactly the type I want to keep out of the party.

"He hates my guts. I was going to say the feeling is mutual, but that would not be appropriate," Manning chuckled.

Holocaust Museum

Despite opposition from some veterans' groups, plans to add a Holocaust gallery to the Canadian War Museum will proceed, said George McDonald, president of the Canadian Museum of Civilization.

"Culling the social history of war is definitely part of the mandate of the museum," McDonald said. "We are entirely committed to building the Holocaust gallery."

The Holocaust wing is part of a $12-million renovation at the war museum, which is overseen by the Museum of Civilization. Of that, $5 million will be raised privately, and $2 million will be used to construct the section on the Holocaust, McDonald noted.

He said the wing will occupy about 6,000 square feet.

Some veterans groups have said the wing would be out of place at the museum because the Holocaust is not part of Canadian military history. Others have said they were not consulted about the plans.

McDonald said the museum will consult with veterans' groups, but that the plans for the Holocaust gallery are firm.

David Sultan

Norman Spector, Canada's former ambassador to Israel and now publisher of the Jerusalem Post, is "conducting a personal vendetta" against Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy, stated Israel's envoy to this country, David Sultan.

In the wake of the passport affair, Spector publicly contradicted Axworthy by saying Canadian intelligence agencies and the Mossad have a long history of cooperation.

Sultan called the passport episode "embarrassing," but added, now, "it is behind us."

He revealed that Canada and Israel plan to embark on a joint project to mark Israel's 50th anniversary (see story, page 1).

Fly-in participants also viewed the Centenary of the Jewish Press exhibit and the Jacob M. Lowy collection of rare Judaic books.

King calls for renewed ties

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Martin Luther King III pledged to "reignite and rebuild" the relationship his late father had with American Jews in the civil rights movement of the 1960s.

At a B'nai Brith Covenant Breakfast, he described black-Jewish relations as having become "strained" over the last 15 years and said that each community must work toward finding common ground for dialogue once again.

"A people that does not remember their history is doomed to repeat the mistakes of the past," he said at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

King, in an interview later, said he feels relations between Jews and blacks have deteriorated because many blacks believe Jews are major owners in the media and entertainment industry, which are both seen as portraying blacks and issues important to them in a negative light.

He would like to see dialogue between the black community and influential persons in these industries to defuse "the anger and frustration."

King acknowledged that Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan has said some "derogatory" things about Jews that have been "interpreted as hostile," but suggested his attitude to Jews is ambiguous.

Nazi gold links rejected

deposited 2,586 tons of gold in Ottawa for safekeeping. Among those states were Britain, Belgium, the Netherlands, France, Norway and Poland.

"Large amounts of gold crossed the Atlantic in the early war period, especially from the Bank of England and the Banque of France. After 1941, virtually no more gold arrived from Europe...All the transactions in question in this report were paper transfers of gold ownership between one central bank account at the Bank of Canada and other central bank accounts. There is therefore no possibility that tainted gold — gold looted by Germany — ever found its way into the Canadian gold stream."

McDowall found that in 1942 the Bank of England was desperate to obtain Swiss francs to support international trade. The Swiss agreed to the transaction. Britain transferred 56 tons of its gold, held in Ottawa, to the BNS on condition that Switzerland not physically transfer the gold except to other central banks in the Western hemisphere or, on paper, to other neutral countries.

Meanwhile, in the spring of 1942 the BNS began looking for ways to build up its internal gold reserves as a check on inflation. It arranged with the Portuguese central bank to trade four tons of its gold, held in Ottawa, for a similar amount of gold held by the Portuguese in a vault in Switzerland.

"Thus, the Swiss succeeded in obtaining the free use of four tons of gold in Switzerland in return for surrendering four tons of assuredly clean gold in Canada."

He noted that during the war the Nazis looted gold from occupied countries as well as plundering it from individuals, including "non-monetary gold stripped from the Jewish victims of Nazi death camps.

"This sinister gold passed through the mill of Nazi refining and had been filtered through bank accounts and commercial transactions with European neutral banks."

However, the report also found that the gold transferred by the Portuguese bank to the BNS in 1942 "was generally believed to be drawn from an account 'thought to be without German taint'. There is no absolute assurance that this swapped gold was beyond all possible taint, but this evidence and the complete absence of any indication of concern on the part of Allied bankers involved in the swap indicates that this was likely the case. Once again, national liquidity needs, not schemes to launder dirty German gold, seemed to drive the transaction."

In preparing his report, McDowall notes he had unrestricted access to all Bank of Canada documents, board minutes and ledgers. Altogether, he perused 350 files.

In recent years, controversy over looted gold and dormant Swiss accounts has led to the creation of historical commissions in Switzerland, Portugal, Sweden, Britain and the United States. The Eizenstadt report prepared in the United States, "does not contain a single mention of Canada in connection with the issue of looted gold, despite the survey of over 15 million documents in reaching its conclusion," McDowall wrote.

Congress said it was satisfied with McDowall's findings. The report is "comprehensive, fair-minded and indicates that Canada behaved properly and is not a villain in the Nazi gold piece," said Irving Abella, chair of Congress' war crimes committee.

Immigrants group planning to revitalize historic landmark

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — "Nothing has changed. It's absolutely gorgeous," gasps Herman Newman as we walk through Pier 21 on the Halifax waterfront.

"I can come here and sit and walk for hours," says the Holocaust survivor, who, as a 17-year-old, entered Canada at this Halifax landmark, which welcomed more than 1.5 million immigrants between 1928 and its closing in 1971.

Newman arrived in 1948, later married Anna Clare of Halifax, raised three sons, became a successful real estate developer and moved to Toronto two years ago to be closer to their children and nine grandchildren. But he makes sure he spends part of every Remembrance Day at Pier 21.

"People like me get nostalgic. All I have left [of my youth] are memories and, like prayers, they strengthen your way of life."

Newman has willingly shared his story of the lengthy time spent in Auschwitz and Dachau with thousands of people so it will not be lost.

He tells about spending two teenage years in a British hospital, recovering his strength, before being offered the opportunity to settle in Canada.

"I left there because I was tired of saying thank you. I wanted to be on my own. I had a chance to be adopted in Toronto but refused. When I came down that gangplank in Halifax, my first thought was 'I'm a free man. I just want to stay and build my own life.'"

Newman was only one of the large number of immigrants who first set foot on Canadian soil at Pier 21. The Pier 21 Society is in the midst of a $9-million campaign to revitalize the immigration shed, to pay tribute to and honor the legacy of those who passed through the historic landmark.

"If the walls of Pier 21 could talk, they would tell my story and that of many others who came through here," says Canadian author Peter Newman, a member of the national advisory committee, which also includes Trevor Eyton of Brascan, Peter Herndorf of TVOntario, Ann McCaig, chancellor, University of Alberta, Sen. Mira Spivak and Dr. Joseph Y.K. Wong, honorary chair, United Way Greater Toronto.

Ruth Goldbloom, Halifax, chair of the Pier 21 Society, is enthusiastic about the response to the fundraising campaign to which federal, provincial and municipal governments have committed $4 million.

"Canadians from coast to coast are responding with offers of memorabilia and stories. We've already raised $2 million from the private sector but need more to make the new Pier 21 a reality. People can find us at Web site [http://pier21.ns.ca/11]."

Herman Newman looks from the pier to George's Island, a few hundred metres away. "I remember standing on the deck of the Aquitania and seeing that island from the mouth of Halifax Harbor. I knew I'd make my home in Halifax."

Program improves GymSkills

For the past 18 years the GymSkills® Program has provided the opportunity for over 3,000 children ages 16 months to 10 years, of all abilities, to improve their physical skills, increase their self-confidence and enjoy being physically active. GymSkills® is a non-competitive physical education program that focuses on the development of hand-eye co-ordination, sports skills, gymnastic skills, agility, balance, strength and fitness.

GymSkills® recognizes that every child's abilities are unique and provides an individual skill development program for each student. Individual programming makes it possible to successfully challenge every child to their full potential according to their individual abilities. Several children may be involved in the same activity but each is working at a level that provides challenge as well as opportunities for success.

Through positive reinforcement the children are also encouraged to work independently to further develop their acquired skills. This increased sense of independence leads to improved self-confidence when participating in sports and physical activities at school, on the playground and in the neighbourhood.

Registration is now being taken for the following 1998 programs. New sessions begin in January.

Classic GymSkills - Individual progressive development of gymnastic skills, hand-eye co-ordination and body awareness to promote muscular strength, agility, balance, flexibility, self-confidence and independence. For ages 2 1/2 and older.

Community Sports Program - Basketball, baseball, soccer and floor hockey. Basic skills and team concepts are taught and everyone is given opportunities to participate and have fun in game situations. Boys and girls ages 5 and older of all abilities are welcome.

Bikes and Balls - Offered in weekly winter classes and as a full-time summer camp program. Skill exercises and games develop the hand-eye co-ordination and balance skills necessary to participate in these two very popular social activities. Dr. Richard Klein, of the University of Illinois, has introduced a prototype of his unique training bike. It is designed to make learning to ride without training wheels quicker and easier and without falling off. Ages 3 and up.

Parents and Tots - Toddlers have fun and learn basic safety rules while swinging, climbing, running, jumping, throwing and catching. Parents enjoy the discovery of providing opportunities for their child to safely develop their physical skills and their independence. Ages 16 months to 2 1/2 years.

New! Club GymSkills - Games, sports and fitness to promote friendship and recreation in a fun, social environment. Ages 3 and up.

Steeles Memorial Chapel keeps up the good work

Founded in 1927 as a community chapel with a board comprised of members from community organizations, Steeles Memorial has kept pace with the northward movement of Toronto's Jewish community. College Memorial Chapel as it was then called had its earliest locations on Bathurst St. and on College St. Steeles Memorial is now located on the border of Thornhill and the City of Toronto.

During the 70 years since its founding, Steeles has broadened its mandate from providing dignified funerals at a reasonable cost to include ongoing charitable work on behalf of charities and institutions in the Jewish community and beyond.

As a non-profit community institution, Steeles supports Jewish community organizations such as ORT, REENA Foundation, the Ronald Feld Fund, the Jewish Russian Community Centre, the Jewish Public Library, Chabad Lubavitch of Toronto, Israel Cancer Research Fund, Baycrest Centre, Camp Ramah, and many schools, yeshivot, senior projects, and synagogues.

In addition to community-based organizations, Steeles assists needy families and individuals through an outreach program, working with rabbis of all denominations to discreetly find families in need and offer them assistance. As John H. Pollock, Q.C., Legal Counsel states: "We are always there to help. We are the ones who are privileged to perform the mitzvah of assisting the needy."

Steeles sees itself as assisting the broader community as well, by allocating donations among charities such as the Salvation Army, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the AIDS Committee of Toronto, the Canadian Cancer Society, the Canadian Diabetes Society, and a number of medical research foundations. Moreover, Steeles donates to the Toronto Hospital, the Hospital for Sick Children and many other Toronto area hospitals.

It is a policy of Steeles that if a Jewish child under 18 years of age passes away, the funeral is without charge. "At such a time," says Henry Lederman, the Treasurer of Steeles, "there is more than enough grief and trauma for a family to deal with." This is a unique practice that Steeles Memorial offers.

Steeles Memorial is involved in many aspects of Jewish life, and has an innovative approach to Tzedakah. While resources are not bottomless, no worthy cause goes unconsidered; new ideas for charitable work are constantly being explored. At present, a project to house the homeless is being pursued. "Where we're needed, and to the extent we can help, we will," says President Mike Rogow.

Every funeral at Steeles Memorial is also helping a large number and variety of worthy causes. The deceased are memorialized by the giving of Tzedakah. The recipients of these benefits are those organizations which improve the quality of life for the poor, the sick, children and the aged. "This is perhaps why Steeles has gained greater acceptance over the past decade," says Rogow.

Steeles, always sensitive to the needs of the families they serve, offers options and flexibility in funeral arrangements. Cost is often tailored to the ability to pay. Alternatively, more modest arrangements are available, always with sensitivity and dignity. Steeles is aware that there are families who are unable to pay anything. Full service is available, in which Steeles handles every detail.

Whatever the choice, one thing is not flexible: all funerals are in accordance with the principles of halachah.

Steeles also suggests families consider funeral pre-arrangement. Staff are available to answer questions often asked about funeral pre-arrangement.

Steeles Memorial Chapel is located at 350 Steeles Avenue West, in Thornhill. For information please call President Mike Rogow: (905) 881-6003 or (416) 733-2000.

Israelis celebrate 50th anniversary of UN resolution

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM — Some 10,000 people participated in a recent street celebration in Tel Aviv marking the 50th anniversary of the UN partition resolution that led to the creation of the state.

The event recreated the moments of waiting for the results of the UN vote 50 years ago, and the celebrating that occurred after it. The crowd held signs that read "Boo to the White Paper" and "A Hebrew state now!"

Actor Tuvia Tzafir played the roles of Golda Meir and David Ben-Gurion.

At a ceremony at Independence Hall, Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo presented a gift of appreciation to the ambassadors of the 33 UN member nations that approved the resolution.

Tourism Minister Moshe Katsav, who represented the government, noted that the State of Israel had still not achieved peace with all its Arab neighbors, as it had hoped 50 years ago.

"Let us hope that during the coming jubilee we will reach a comprehensive peace and that all Jews will immigrate to Israel," he said.

Gideon Samet, 93, who covered the celebrations 50 years ago for Ha'aretz, recalled the original event as one of "fear, pride, and gumption."

Geula Ben-Eliezer, the daughter of David Ben-Gurion, recalled her father's depression as he feared the impending invasion of the Arab armies.

"We need men like him today," she said. "But where will they come from?"

There were also a number of special performances in the city, including a concert by the Israel Philharmonic and a festive performance by the Batsheva Dance Company.

Strikers defy court ruling

By MICHAL YUDELMAN, DAVID HARRIS, AND DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A strike by 150,000 clerks and municipal workers was to continue for a second day Monday in defiance of a National Labor Court ruling Sunday that permitted only a 24-hour walkout.

The Histadrut also planned to discuss widening the sanctions at a meeting Monday, after threatening Sunday to have civil servants and bank workers join in the strike unless progress was made in talks with the Treasury.

The strike encompasses workers of 360 local authorities, and has paralyzed day-care centres, nursery schools, government corporations and national institutions like the Jewish Agency and Jewish National Fund.

Magen David Adom and fire fighters were operating only on an emergency basis.

Many schools were also disrupted, since maintenance personnel and secretaries were also on strike.

An additional 20,000 clerks were expected to join the strike Monday, which would affect the Clalit health fund, Jerusalem hospitals, universities, ORT schools, other colleges, Amidar, Amigur and Zim.

The strike was launched in protest against government demands for cost-cutting measures by local authorities to reduce an overall NIS 4 billion deficit. Some cuts would erase workers' bonuses.

No progress was reported at a meeting between Histadrut strike organizer Shlomo Shani and Treasury director of wages and labor agreements Yossi Kucik.

Kucik charged that the strike offered a "seal of approval to illegal work agreements in the municipalities and encourages excessively high wages."

He has held up paying local authorities. He demands that the authorities agree not to use the funds for wage bonuses, and to put them instead toward efficiency measures.

A Treasury statement listed a series of alleged illegal fringe benefits being paid to many Histadrut local council workers. This list included global overtime, vehicle stipends to employees who allegedly don't use their own cars and supplementary milk payments.

The National Labor Court, which upheld the strike but gave it a 24-hour limit, was expected to decided Monday about whether to issue back to work orders.

A number of regional councils have issued back to work orders that were ignored.

Civil servants and bank workers are considering whether to join the strike in the next few days, in protest against hundreds of dismissals and alleged violations of work agreements.

Bank employees are also angry with a government decision to take the management of provident funds out of the hands of the banks.

The Union of Local Authorities in Israel (ULAI) has also threatened to take legal action against Histadrut activists. ULAI chair Adi Eldar warned.

He called on the parties to return to the negotiating table to resolve the dispute.

Eldar, who is mayor of Karmiel, said it was totally unfair that hundreds of thousands of people should suffer having municipal services shut down.

Karmiel municipality spokesperson Leviah Fischer said the worst effects of the strike were felt by parents and especially single mothers who could not send children to kindergartens.

"It is a very difficult problem for working parents," she said, adding that many were forced to stay home from work.

Cabinet endorses pullout resolution

The resolution also contained an unequivocal expression of support for the West Bank settlements.

"The government will take all the necessary measures for their existence and strengthening," it said.

These measures will be designed to "reduce points of friction between Israeli settlers and local Palestinian residents and increase the security of both populations" — words that could be interpreted to mean enlarging the existing settlements and building more bypass roads around Palestinian towns and villages.

Israel Radio said Naveh and Netanyahu's political adviser Uzi Arad, travelled to Egypt Monday to brief Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and his top adviser Osama el-Baz on the proposal.

Naveh said contact also will be made with the United States, Jordan, and other countries.

Sources close to Sharon not only indicated their satisfaction with the meeting's outcome, but contended that it reflected his proposals.

One of the points he raised, which the cabinet will consider, is that if Arafat should declare an independent Palestinian state, Israel immediately would annex the projected security zones (including the Jordan Valley), settlements, access roads and military bases.

Sharon also urged his cabinet colleagues to tour the areas to be designated as security zones as soon as possible, a proposal unstintingly endorsed by Netanyahu.

Naveh explained that the extent of the proposed troop redeployment will encompass the first and second pullbacks required by the Oslo Accords.

The cabinet secretary confirmed that if the Palestinians defer or reject the proposals due to emerge from the ministerial team's deliberations, the consequence will be a delay in the next troop pullback.

The Palestinians had mixed reactions to the cabinet decision.

Several Palestinian officials charged the plan is "a continuation of the Israeli government's attempt to evade the agreement on further redeployment."

But Arafat's spokesperson, Marwan Kanafani, called the decision encouraging.

"The decision to redeploy is encouraging, but some of the terms mentioned cause us to be skeptical as to the government's sincerity in implementing the redeployment," he said.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat charged that the PA had not received any official statement from the Israeli government and would comment only when such a statement was received.

"We cannot negotiate such issues via the media. We don't know if Netanyahu's decision is in response to U.S. or European pressure or due to internal problems within the Likud," he said.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai is expected to convene top security advisers and senior IDF officers to discuss the various options regarding the pullback in the territories, defence sources said.

But the sources said that the meeting will not discuss percentages, since that is contingent on the government's decision.

Compensation talks deadlocked

By DEIDRE BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

FRANKFURT — Talks between German and Jewish officials about expanding compensation payments to Holocaust survivors appear to be deadlocked, just weeks before a final report is expected.

Rabbi Andrew Baker, director of European relations for the American Jewish Committee, said he was disappointed by the latest discussions.

Among other issues, Jewish organizations have demanded that Germany pay eastern European survivors reparations similar to those now given to survivors living in western countries.

Israel & the Jewish World

Islamic rebellion rocks Egypt

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Fifty-eight foreign tourists, mainly Swiss, were murdered in one fell swoop by Islamic fundamentalists in Luxor, Egypt, last month. The cold-blooded rampage, the worst in the country's history, made a mockery of the government's boast that the radicals had been decimated.

Mideast Analysis

Now in its fifth year, the Islamic rebellion has claimed the lives of some 1,200 individuals, far less than the toll exacted by Algeria's civil war but far more than the deaths recorded in Israel's struggle against Hamas terrorism since 1994.

The Islamic Group, a violent offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood, the first modern Islamic movement in the Arab world, has spearheaded the terrorist campaign in Egypt.

Founded in the late 1970s by Muslim theologians, army officers and lawyers, the Islamic Group is a breakaway faction of Jihad, which carried out the 1981 assassination of then president Anwar al-Sadat. Its chief objective, the establishment of an Islamic state in Egypt, has been fiercely resisted by the secular regime, headed by Sadat's successor, Hosni Mubarak.

The government, which has ruled by decree since Sadat's murder, has spared no effort to crush the radicals, whose spiritual leader, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, is presently serving a life sentence in the United States for his role in the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Centre in New York City.

Yet, judging by the massacre in Luxor, the centre of Egypt's vital tourist industry, the ongoing security crackdown has, at best, been only a qualified success.

Apart from tourists, the Islamic Group has taken aim at police officers, cabinet ministers, Coptic Christians, secular journalists and intellectuals (including Nobel Prize literature laureate Naguib Mahfouz), diplomats and even Mubarak himself.

In June 1995, gunmen tried to kill Mubarak in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. Five months later, suicide bombers stormed the Egyptian Embassy in Islamabad, Pakistan, killing 15 people.

Tourists, ministers targetted

Tourists, in particular, have been targeted because they generate valuable hard currency. Tourism is one of the five pillars of the Egyptian economy, the other four being remittances from Egyptian workers abroad, revenues from the Suez Canal, cotton and oil.

Aside from the Luxor incident, the most spectacular attacks against tourists have been mounted in the past two years. In April 1996, 18 Greek visitors, having been mistaken for Israelis, were mowed down as they left their hotel in Cairo. This past September, two brothers in sympathy with the Islamic Group killed 10 people, mostly Germans, outside Cairo's fabled Egyptian Museum.

The upsurge of Islamic violence in Egypt is anything but new. Throughout its modern history, Egypt has been repeatedly confronted by the Islamist challenge. Typically, Egypt's secular nationalist elite has hewed to a carrot-and-stick policy in dealing with the Islamists. When attempts at co-option have failed, repression has been the weapon of choice of successive leaders from Gamal Abdel Nasser to Sadat. It is an endless battle.

Be they extremists or moderates, the Islamists have won a sizable following. They feed on poverty, official corruption and the trend toward greater religious conservatism.

Of late, Egypt's heretofore anemic economy has begun to boom. But the new wealth has largely benefited the well-connected moneyed classes, hardly having trickled down to the impoverished masses. The state, in a bid to outflank Islamic militants, has promoted its brand of Islam by grafting Islamic law on the legal system and by appointing pliable clerics. But the tactic has yielded fairly disappointing results, while Islamists have taken over professional and student unions, gained a foothold in parliament, imposed their narrow, puritanical values on society, and continually called for a severance of Egypt's diplomatic relations with Israel.

Egypt's present relations with Israel are quite chilly, but if the Islamists win power, the entire strategic situation in the Middle East will be drastically altered.

CJN Chanukah Poetry Contest

The CJN announces its third annual Chanukah poetry contest.

Who can enter: Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their family.

There are three age categories for entrants: 1. Twelve years old and under; 2. Thirteen to 18 years old; 3. Eighteen years old and up.

How to enter: The poems must be about Chanukah; they cannot be longer than 40 lines. A maximum of one poem per entrant may be submitted. Please include your name, age, address and phone number with the poem.

We would prefer to receive typewritten poems if possible.

We will return poems if you send a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your poems to:
CJN Chanukah Poetry Contest, The Canadian Jewish News,
1500 Don Mills Road., Suite 205, North York, Ontario, M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Dec. 8, 1997.

Prizes: The judges will choose six poems to be published, two from each of the three categories, which in their opinion, most poetically and evocatively convey an aspect of the meaning of Chanukah. Each of the "winners" will also receive a cheque for $50.

Only six poems will be selected as "winners". Space permitting, we may publish other poems as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of "winning" depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: "Winning" entrants will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, Dec. 12, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning poems will be published in The CJN of Dec. 25, 1997. We look forward to receiving your poems. May the miracle of Chanukah and the magic of its light be reflected in your poems.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

JERUSALEM — The contractors who built a bridge that collapsed during the opening ceremonies of July's Maccabiah Games are going to face trial.

State Attorney Edna Arbel has decided to bring charges against those responsible for organizing and constructing the bridge, Israeli media reported.

Those who will be charged include Baruch Karagula and Yehoshua Ben Ezra, the contractors who built the bridge; Micha Bar Ilan, the bridge's engineer; Adam Mishori, the head of Irgunit, the firm that subcontracted to Ben Ezra and Karagula; and Yoram Eyal, the head of the organizing committee for the international games.

The decision comes just one week after more than 40 Australian survivors of the bridge collapse announced that they will sue Israeli officials and the company that built that bridge.

Two Australian athletes were immediately killed July 14 and hundreds of other participants at the Games injured, when a pedestrian bridge collapsed during the opening ceremony at the Ramat Gan stadium, plunging scores of people into the Yarkon River.

Two more Australians died weeks later as a result of complications that medical officials linked to contaminants in the river water.

Law suits planned

By JEREMY JONES
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY, Australia — More than 40 Australian survivors of July's Maccabiah Games' bridge collapse have announced they will sue Israeli officials.

The survivors will also sue the Maccabi World Union, which organized the Games, and the company that built the bridge, according to lawyer Peter Redlich, who said he will represent most of the injured.

He described the bridge collapse as the result of the most "gross example of negligence" he has seen in 40 years.

Other suits may be filed by families of the athletes who died, and by the family of Sasha Elterman, 15, who has been hospitalized with a brain abscess that doctors say was caused by the polluted water.

Maccabi Australia president Tom Goldman responded to news of the proposed suit, saying, "Nobody has really stood up and been held accountable and responsible, and it has to be done.

"It is close to 4½ months" since the accident. "That's a long time," he said, speaking before Israel announced it would prosecute builders of the bridge.

One Australian athlete injured in the incident, tennis player Sasha Elterman, 15, has been hospitalized with a brain abscess that doctors say may have been caused by the polluted water.

A week after the bridge collapse, an Israeli commission found that the accident was caused by a chain of failures involving the bridge's planning and construction.

The commission found the engineer and contractors who built the bridge at fault for poor planning and execution.

The commission also found that the contracting company that built the bridge had no experience in bridge construction.

It also criticized Maccabiah organizers for trying to cut costs and for failing to closely supervise the construction work.

Leaders of the Australian Jewish community have expressed frustration with what they said was the slow pace of the investigation.

In recent visits to Israel and in meetings with prosecutors, they have demanded that those responsible for the collapse face charges.

Switzerland dragging its feet: Bronfman

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — By channeling money to Germany in return for stolen Jewish gold, Switzerland in fact prolonged World War II, World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman charged last week.

Furthermore, Switzerland is now dragging its feet with regard to heirless assets belonging to Jewish victims and should follow the example of other European countries such as Norway, which have reassessed their attitude and are taking action, Bronfman said.

"It is like pulling teeth to get the Swiss to do something" at the Volcker committee, Bronfman told a session of the Knesset Committee on Restitution of Jewish Property.

"Its work is slow and ponderous. Switzerland should examine its past with speed like other European countries... I hope we can achieve an honorable end" to the Holocaust restitution process, he said.

Repeating past allegations, Bronfman also accused the Swiss of turning a blind eye during the war to transports of Jews to death camps on trains that went through Zurich.

Thomas Borer, a Swiss Foreign Ministry envoy who heads a Swiss task force on World War II, denied the accusation.

Mount Sinai doctor gets research award

TORONTO — The Eli Lilly Canada/National Cancer Institute of Canada's cancer research awards were presented recently to Canadian scientists.

Three of Canada's most respected researchers received their 1997 awards from the National Cancer Institute of Canada for outstanding research that has had worldwide impact on our understanding of cancer.

"We are honored to celebrate some of Canada's best scientists," said Dr. Robert Phillips, executive director of the National Cancer Institute of Canada, the research organization that distributes funds from the Canadian Cancer Society and the Terry Fox Foundation.

"These awards give us an opportunity to tell the public that Canadian research is having an impact far beyond the borders of Canada. We are grateful to Eli Lilly for sponsoring these awards."

Each award has a $1,000 prize and the Robert L. Noble Prize recipient is given an additional $20,000 for a research project.

The 1997 Canadian winners are:

Dr. Alan Bernstein, director of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute, Mount Sinai Hospital, and professor of molecular and medical genetics, medical biophysics, medicine, University of Toronto, received the Robert L. Noble Prize. This prize is given to a scientist who has made the most significant scientific research contribution to a greater understanding of cancer.

Dr. Norman Boyd, head of epidemiology and statistics at the Ontario Cancer Institute, director of Preventive Oncology at Cancer Care Ontario and professor of medicine, University of Toronto, received the O. Harold Warwick Prize, which honors excellence in cancer control.

Dr. Jerry Pelletier, associate professor of biochemistry and oncology at McGill University, received the William E. Rawls Prize, which recognizes outstanding achievement by a promising researcher in the early stages of his/her career.

Dr. Tak Mak, director of Amgen Institute, senior scientist at the Ontario Cancer Institute and professor of medical biophysics and immunology, University of Toronto received the 1996 Robert L. Noble Prize. Mak was honored for his breakthrough work in tumor biology, the discovery of the gene for the blood's killer T-cell receptors, and for producing genetically altered mice for in-depth studies on the immune system and cancer.

Eli Lilly Canada Inc. is a research-based pharmaceutical company that is involved in the discovery, development and marketing of treatments for cancer, cardiovascular diseases, diseases of the central nervous system, infectious diseases, diabetes, osteoporosis and women's health.

Increase in Bell's Palsy reported

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An increase in the number of cases of Bell's Palsy in the Greater Toronto Area has resulted in a study to find a cause.

The total of 300 cases reported in the past few months triggered the study, said Dr. Andrew Morris, the principal investigator at Mt. Sinai Hospital and Toronto Hospital.

There is a suspicion that the cause may be an entero-virus, such as that which causes the flu, gastro-intestinal symptoms or diarrhea, but this has yet to be confirmed, Morris said. On the basis of past studies, herpes viruses are also sometimes implicated.

Bell's Palsy results in a partial paralysis of facial muscles and usually clears up in six to eight weeks.

The first "cluster" of six patients with the disorder was reported by neurologist Dr. Warren Goldstein, of York Region. The cases were in Newmarket, Richmond Hill, Thornhill and Aurora.

A collaborative study by several hospitals confirmed that the increase was area-wide and not confined to any age or ethnic group.

What has caused some concern, Morris said, is the possibility that it is contagious, as two sets of spouses, two cousins and five doctors have been diagnosed.

However, he said, ordinary precautions, such as not sharing the same towels or eating utensils should be sufficient to prevent the spread of the disorder. Cutting off contact between patients and children or other family members would be extreme.

Those monitoring the situation are anxious that physicians report any cases that have developed since Aug. 1. The same applies to patients. The hot line number at Mt. Sinai Hospital is 416-586-4999.

Chanukah Continuity Campaign

As our way of helping to ensure the irreversibility of Jewish continuity, The CJN is launching a special continuity subscription campaign in time for Chanukah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $14.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Over the past few years, The CJN has grown and evolved into an award-winning national community newspaper widely read both here in Canada and abroad. We are extremely proud of this publication. Could there be a better gift at Chanukah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Sincerely,

mordechai Bendet

The editor.

Yoga "really cool"

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When 10-year-old twins Courtney and Tara Neray heard Temmi Ungerman Sears talk about learning yoga, they thought it sounded like something cool to do. Now that they have taken classes with her since October, they think it is really cool.

When people think of yoga, they often think of twisting into weird positions or standing on your head. While that may be part of very advanced yoga, Ungerman Sears sees yoga as "more of a fitness program – a lifestyle."

She says that yoga has many benefits, like more open joints, toned muscles, increased flexibility and better balance and coordination.

Yoga also gives you "an inner sense of calm," she says.

Right now, she runs her program at Cedarvale Public School, as well as in private classes in her home, but she says that she eventually wants to open in her own place.

Children, Ungerman says, are by nature "action based, and not only love to move but need to move." While they learn nearly the same yoga poses as adults do, she concentrates more on "novelty, variety and speed."

It bothers her how stiff kids are, because, she thinks, "they are getting less exercise and are always sitting in front of a computer."

Also, she says, a lot of youngsters have so many after-school and weekend activities, that they are stressed out. Yoga is a great way to exercise, and also to relax.

"Kids need time to play, and learn, and enjoy their body," she says.

The class begins with warm-up group games, yoga poses and stretching. Then there are yoga poses, breath work, and – what the kids like best – the relaxation at the end.

"They lie flat on the floor, palms upturned, and wear black silk eye pillows to black out the light. The pillows are filled with lavender and flax seed, so they smell really good."

Each week, she talks about a different theme from nature, such as the beach, the ocean, or a forest.

Breathing exercises are an important part of every class. "Breath is the bridge between the mind and body," she says.

Besides working with children, Ungerman Sears works with women before and after they have a baby, people with weight problems and those who have been abused. She even works with kids who have ADHD (Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder).

But her favorite is working with young children. "They can do anything. Just by practising, they improve."

She says the greatest reward for them is "increased self-confidence and self-esteem."

The kids are given things to practise during the week. Tara and Courtney practise with their younger brother.

They even tell you with a giggle that their father now does yoga in his office at lunchtime.

Jerusalem Trio

Concert bridges cultural gap

"Culture is Israel's bridge to the world, never permitting us to be isolated." – Aura Herzog, wife of Chaim Herzog, former president of Israel.

Special to The CJN

The Jerusalem Trio in performance: (from left) Roy Shiloah, violin; Yaron Rosenthal, piano; and Ariel Tushinsky, cello.

TORONTO — To strengthen the cultural bridge between the two countries on the eve of Israel's 50th anniversary, the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation's (CICF) local chapter arranged for the Toronto premiere of the Jerusalem Trio.

The audience became acquainted with Israel's youngest musical diplomats at the trio's recent showcase performance at the Jane Mallett Theatre of the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts.

"For me, it was very exciting to see this young talent being developed in Israel, and the reception they received here was fantastic," said Lorand Fenyves, a professor in the faculty of music at the University of Toronto and co-founder of the Tel Aviv Conservatory and Academy of Music (now part of the Tel Aviv University).

"It is important they receive this kind of support because they are very committed and I think the trio will have a bright future."

The Israeli musicians played selections by Beethoven, Schumann and Shostakovich, and seemed particularly inspired by the latter composer.

Their choice of Shostakovich's Piano Trio No. Two (Opus 67) was most appropriate, they later told The CJN, in that it reflects on the time period into which Israel was born, because the composer drew on chassidic themes in a post-World War II context.

"Chassidic music is filled with both laughter and tears, and Shostakovich realized you can't have one without the other," said violinist Roy Shiloah, 26, of Beersheva. "This macabre tale of demonic dance has one finding emptiness, madness, sadness and then madness again, and in the process, drawing on synagogue imagery, including the singing of the Kaddish by the cantor.

Artist gives Canadian perspective to Holy Land

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ron Clavier waited until his 25th wedding anniversary before visiting Israel for the first time, but the impact was instantaneous.

He felt that he had come home, he says.

A psychologist holding a doctorate from Chicago's Northwestern University and an artist like his father before him, he responded with a series of intuitive oil paintings that are featured in a solo exhibition, The Holy Land: Canadian Perspective, at Rosedale United Church, Dec. 5 to Jan. 15, 1998.

Clavier looks on displaying his works in a church as an ecumenical outreach, a bridge between peoples. Rosedale United's recently retired minister, he notes, has led congregational tours to Israel.

Originally from Montreal, Clavier and his wife and two daughters have lived in various parts of Canada and the United States but are now settled in Toronto where he has a clinical and consulting practice.

Exploring Israel during his trip, he experienced a magnetism reaching into his Jewish core. He sought not only the familiar sites, interpreting them afresh, but also lesser known scenes for their distinctive appeal.

> 'this holiest of places'

Accompanying each work in the exhibition is a quote from one of three sources: the Bible, British artist David Roberts' Holy Land journal, or personal reflection.

In conjunction with his painting, Western Wall, is this statement: "As a Jew who has always emphasized the humanistic and cultural aspects of my heritage, I always wondered how I would feel at this holiest of places... When the time came, I was surprised by the sense of peace and warmth that overcame me.

"In the midst of crowds of chanting worshippers, I felt as though I was about to have a private encounter. Everybody else seemed to melt away and I found myself reciting what I consider to be the most fundamental principal of Judaism: Shema Yisrael, HaShem Elokeinu, HaShem Echad (Hear O Israel, the Lord is our God, the Lord is One)."

Sabra brings to life the prickly pear cactus under a desert sun. Here Clavier explains that the plant's fruit, hard and prickly on the outside, soft and sweet on the inside, is often used to define the character of the native born Israeli, who is known as a sabra.

Although Clavier's Holy Land exhibition is primarily scenic, many works on his office walls are figurative portraits, exemplifying his belief in the unity of human anatomy and the human psyche.

Sabra brings to life the prickly pear cactus.

Rosedale United Church is at 159 Roxborough Dr. Exhibition hours are 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday and Sunday mornings. For more information, call 489-0300.

"Our interpretation of the piece is to play it with a sense of life and suspense, like the calm before the storm and then the storm at the moment it hits," said cellist Ariel Tushinsky, 28, of Tel Aviv.

Shiloah and Tushinsky, both previously soloists with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, founded the trio with Haifa-based pianist Yaron Rosenthal, now 29, a former soloist himself with the Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra.

Since performing together in 1989, the Jerusalem Trio have recorded in Israel, Europe, Australia, South America and the United States. Garnering critical acclaim in international competition, the trio were prize winners of the 1995 Melbourne International Chamber Music Competition.

The Toronto concert followed the trio's national debut in Ottawa, and served to raise funds to help future generations of Israeli artists.

The members of the trio are all recipients of the foundation's Sharett scholarship as artists-in-residence at the Banff Centre for the Arts in Alberta. Shiloah says the mixed residency program of study and performance will give the trio the opportunity to prepare for a worldwide tour scheduled to start in February.

Following the St. Lawrence Centre appearance, the Jerusalem Trio headed to Vancouver to meet with musicians Murray Perahia, Issac Stern and Bernhard Greenhouse, all of whom have coached them.

CARP leads the battle against CPP reform

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The political clout of Canadian seniors has become legendary.

In 1985, angry seniors confronted then prime minister Brian Mulroney over suggested changes to seniors benefits, and the besieged government issued a statement affirming the principle of universality.

By 1997, government strategy was taking into account seniors' political muscle. Federal officials, including Finance Minister Paul Martin, went to great lengths to consult with elderly Canadians and seniors groups across the country.

One of those who received a visit from a federal delegation was Lillian Morgenthau, president of the Canadian Association of Retired Persons (CARP), one of Canada's most influential seniors groups. The amicable meeting between Martin and his aides, on the one hand, and CARP representatives on the other, focused on federal plans to introduce a new Seniors Benefit (SB) that will take the place of the Old Age Security (OAS) and Guaranteed Income Supplement (GIS) programs. The participants also discussed RRSP rules and financial support for those who care for elderly parents or friends.

A visit by the senior minister responsible for the country's financial affairs was certainly a feather in the cap for Morgenthau. It pointed to the importance attributed to CARP by the highest levels of government – quite a heady achievement for an organization that 12 years ago consisted of Morgenthau and her husband, Murray, and which was run out of the basement of their home.

Today, CARP boasts a national membership of 310,000, a head office in Toronto and regional representatives across the country. It prides itself on keeping health and shelter issues on policy-makers' front burners and representing the varied interests of those over 50 years of age.

It has been particularly scathing in its critique of the proposed Seniors Benefit, which was introduced in March 1996 and is to take effect in January 2001. "We feel it is a flawed instrument and should be redone," said Morgenthau.

Although the government claims 75 percent of seniors will do better under the SB compared to current seniors programs, CARP cites numerous financial experts to the contrary. Under the proposed benefits scheme, recipients will get only $120 a year more than they do under the current package, hardly a make or break figure. Meanwhile, Canada Pension Plan (CPP) recipients will see their benefits cut by $12 a month, meaning those who receive both the CPP and the SB will be worse off by $2 a month, CARP points out.

CARP is highly critical of other aspects of the Seniors Benefit, particularly the provision that discriminates between singles and couples. Single seniors will receive $11,240 a year, couples $18,440. A single senior will lose all Seniors Benefits when their income exceeds $52,000, while that figure is $78,000 for couples.

Furthermore, the amount that retirees receive from the SB will be clawed back, based on income, at a much higher rate that that used for current OAS benefits. Today, seniors can earn $53,000 per person in retirement income before losing benefits to clawbacks and they do not lose their OAS benefits completely until their incomes exceed $85,000 a person.

Under the Seniors Benefit, low income seniors earning less than $12,250 (from other sources, such as an RRSP) will lose 50 cents of every dollar of family retirement income they receive. However, those who earn more than $25,921 in family income will lose 20 percent of other source income in clawbacks.

The effect of the new program will be "to eliminate any form of income support for seniors at a much lower income than is now the case. By the year 2001, middle class people will have significantly less retirement income," states a CARP analysis on the Seniors Benefit.

The analysis also suggests that "with the clawbacks, there is little or no incentive for any low, and some middle income Canadians to use RRSPs. If they do, they are likely to have just enough retirement income to trigger all the clawbacks and lose all the benefits of the tax-free Seniors Benefit payments."

Morganthau is passionate in attacking the proposals that discriminate between singles and couples. "It's against marriage," she said. "It suggests common law is the best thing."

Lillian Morgenthau, president of the Canadian Association of Retired Persons.

CARP has received many letters "asking if they'd be better off if they divorced or separated," she added.

CARP has called for massive changes to the SB as well as a 15-year transition phase to allow elderly Canadians to arrange their finances with it in mind.

For Morgenthau, fighting inequities that target seniors was the raison d'être for CARP's creation in the first place. In the mid-1980s when Murray turned 60, his insurance policy tripled.

"I said that's stupid. I'm not paying it. I investigated and got him the same coverage with no rise in fees," Morgenthau said.

At the time, Morgenthau was a housewife active in community volunteer work, helping the Baycrest Centre and B'nai Brith Canada among other places. "I felt [the insurance premium] was terribly unfair, especially after being associated with Baycrest. I realized there must be a lot of people out there in the same boat who didn't have the resources to reverse it."

Motivated by the desire to help seniors, Lillian and Murray discussed the idea of forming CARP. "There is no question in my mind that over-50s needed someone to tell them what was happening in Canada and to inform them of government action," she said.

They approached 10 friends and asked them for $10 each to help get the organization on its feet. Aided by Murray's administrative skills as a businessman, they had cards printed and published a four-page newsletter that was distributed to 312 people. The organization grew through word of mouth and over the years, before attaining national scope.

The list of issues it has addressed is impressive. In 1984, CARP criticized rules that required RRSPs to remain locked in before retirement and that limited the term of an RRIF to 20 years. It lobbied to remove the GST from dental and physio-therapeutic devices and it pushed to change rules that required 80-year-olds to take a yearly driving test. Now, octogenarians need be tested only every two years. CARP has a medical advisory board that advises seniors on new trends in health and it has protested proposals to require doctors to prescribe cheaper, generic drugs, arguing that these are not necessarily the most effective.

"Before CARP," Morgenthau said, "older people accepted everything. Now we tell them, don't accept anything.

"I believe everyone over 50 should belong to CARP, for their own sake," she said.

Sonny Goldstein, CLU,CH.F.C.

Argo lineman confident going into Grey Cup

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Let's face it. It would have taken an upset of biblical proportions for the Saskatchewan Roughriders to knock off the Toronto Argonauts as Grey Cup champions in the season just past. With their star-studded, salary cap-exceeding lineup, the Argos were clearly the class of the Canadian Football League (CFL).

So, it should come as no surprise to anyone who follows the football wars to learn that the Argos were never nervous about losing the big game.

"We were very relaxed, very confident," said Noah Cantor, a backup defensive lineman and kicking team specialist with the Boatmen. Only when the team hit the field for the pre-game warm-up did the players start feeling excited. Last year, there was more nervousness, though not about the game itself. Players were concerned about their footwear and the field conditions, he said.

With the 47-23 Argo victory, the 26-year-old earned his second diamond-encrusted championship ring. By no means "a jewelry person," Cantor wears his first ring only on special occasions, and to show his buddies what all his hard work and dedication got him. After all, he said, "this is always what you play for."

Cantor said his teammates knew right from the start of the season they had the horses to win it all. "It's a great bunch of guys," he said. "Last year, it was a whole new groups of guys so it took longer to gel. We had a good feeling right from the start of the year."

Noah Cantor

Comparing the '97 Grey Cup to last year's win, Cantor said "it feels the same. It's still something you have to work for all year long. The excitement wasn't the same as last year, because that was my first year, but the satisfaction is still there."

As for the game itself, it passed so quickly, "it seems like a big blur now."

At six-foot-four, 265 pounds, Cantor was a key member of the kickoff and return teams and he got in for a couple of short yardage situations. Though coach Don Matthews was quoted saying the Argo backups are an integral part of the team, Cantor would be happier playing a different role.

"As a backup, you don't feel you're an important component. It's hard as a backup. You want to play as much as you can. I find it hard to play that role."

Cantor believes he could be a starter on other CFL teams and he may get the chance to prove that someday soon. After three years with the Argos, his contract is up and he becomes free agent at the end of February, able to sign with any Canadian team without restriction.

Although he's still in the celebration mode and hasn't thought too much about it, Cantor is hopeful he'll earn a starting position with the Argos next season. The entire Argo defensive are becoming free agents and it's still not clear who'll be back with the team next year, he said.

That holds true with other parts of the team as well. Late season rumors had coach Matthews considering a move to the NFL and, despite his protestations to the contrary, there's talk that Doug Flutie might once again try his luck in the No Fun League.

In the two years he's played for Matthews, Cantor is impressed with the coach's knowledge of the game and his preparation. "Everything that happens, he's aware of it. If you make a mistake on the field, he'll let you know. He watches a lot of film. He's very well prepared and he's a great motivator."

In the aftermath of the Grey Cup, Cantor enjoyed the afterglow of the victory and hung out with some of his old St. Mary's University buddies. Together, they attended the Vanier Cup, which St. Mary's lost twice in Cantor's day.

Then Noah, the son of Bev and Danny Cantor, headed back to his hometown of Ottawa and a stint behind the counter of his family's retail meat store, The Butchery. Like last year during the holiday season, "I'll be handing out the turkeys," he said.

The Butchery is operated by Noah's brother, Mark, while his father, Danny, runs the wholesale end of the business.

7-0! Yikes!!

JERUSALEM — Israel's all-star women's soccer team made an athletically unspectacular entrance into international competition recently.

During a World Cup preliminary match in Bat Yam, the visiting Romanian squad trounced Israel by a score of 7-0.

However, the 500 spectators who watched the proceedings tried to remain upbeat.

The Inside Back

Law's image takes beating

A lot has been written lately about the rule of law in Israel; how the attacks by politicians and other public figures have damaged the image of the court system in the eyes of the citizens. I would like to tell a story which highlights another side to this issue.

"Sharon," is a young woman of limited means. She works for the police force in the bookkeeping department and lives with her parents. She decided to purchase an apartment and rent it out, using the rent money to pay the mortgage.

On the advice of family, she rented out the apartment. After a few months, the tenant stopped paying the rent and utilities. Neighbors reported that violent and unsavory people were coming to the building at all hours. Sharon's repeated attempts to rectify the situation did not help, and that was when she came to me.

We had to deal with the problem on two levels. Sharon was able to partially limit her losses by having the electric company, gas provider and telephone company cut the apartment off, but Sharon already owed thousands of shekels to them. When the tenant illegally hooked up to the main lines in the building, Sharon found herself having to pay the new bills and deal with the neighbors, who were furious about the dangerous situation.

Our main task, however, was to turn to the court and obtain an eviction order. Kafka would have been proud: We filed a lawsuit on May 28.

Sharon served the papers the same day. Twenty days later, since the tenant ignored the lawsuit, we petitioned for a default judgment. The judgment was obtained on June 22. The court ordered the tenant to leave immediately. Sharon delivered the judgment to the tenant and we opened a file with the Sheriff's Office (the department that enforces judgments).

It took the Sheriff's Office weeks to print out the first "warning," which the law entitles the tenant to receive. Once the "warning" had been issued, the tenant had 20 days to respond. She did not answer the warning and remained in the apartment.

On Aug. 10, we filed a motion for contempt of court. We received a court date for Nov. 17. The Sheriff's Office sent another warning.

On Sept.16, we filed with the Sheriff's Office for an immediate eviction, since the tenant had still not responded to the various warnings. On Oct. 6, they decided to send her a notice and give her 20 days to respond. However, due to the High Holy Days, a foul-up in the Sheriff's Office and a lack of human resources, it was only delivered to her on Nov. 11.

The contempt of court hearing was on Nov. 17. The tenant didn't bother showing up. The judge said that while the tenant hadn't obeyed the order, it was too early to call it contempt of court and dismissed the motion. She also wished us luck.

On the evening of Nov. 23, 10 days before the scheduled eviction, the tenant was seen abandoning the apartment. Sharon was left with a debt of 30,000 shekels (about $12,000) and great bitterness about the justice system. Throughout the entire period, she had said several times that instead of suing, she should have brought some bullies to solve the problem.

I argued with her constantly. As an officer of the court, it is my duty to discourage vigilante justice and I take that responsibility seriously. I also begged her not to get into trouble and insisted that whatever financial damage she suffered paled in comparison to what "getting into trouble" could do to her career on the police force.

The courts in Israel are known as being fair, impartial and enlightened. They are also clogged and overburdened, leading to ridiculous delays, impatient judges and frustrated litigants. Much of the problem can be traced to the litigious nature of society and the failure of attorneys to sacrifice some income in the interest of their clients by encouraging negotiations and settlements.

At the same time, Sharon's story, petty as it may seem, probably has more to do with the damage to the image of the rule of law in Israel than all the comments of the public figures put together.

CANDY KISS COOKIES
THIS RECIPE BROUGHT TO YOU BY...
HERB CAPLAN
WE SELL Inglis FOR LESS
1111 Weston Road (S. of Eglinton) 767-1655

60 chocolate kisses
powdered sugar

Dough:
1/2 lb butter or margarine
2 1/2 cups all purpose flour
1/2 cup sugar
1 extra large egg
1 tsp vanilla

In food processor fitted with metal blade, mix flour and butter until crumbly. Add sugar, egg, and vanilla. Mix until blended. Dough will be slightly dry. Place on a flat surface and knead into a ball. Divide into 2 and wrap in waxed paper and refrigerate. Take about 60 chocolate kisses and unwrap them. Preheat oven to 350°F. Break off small piece of dough and place candy kiss inside dough and work dough around the kiss making a ball with the kiss in the centre. Repeat with remaining dough and kisses. Place on ungreased baking sheet. Bake 18-20 minutes or until cookies are solid and bottoms are lightly browned. Remove from baking sheet and immediately roll in powdered sugar. Cool and roll in sugar again. May by frozen. Enjoy!!!

About Life

Dear Ella,

Well, here it is the beginning of December and I am starting to panic like I do every year, because I have nothing to do on New Year's Eve.

I haven't been asked out on a date, invited to a party or even to a friend's home to spend the evening together.

Every year around this time, I get this nauseous feeling in the pit of my stomach. I don't know why I can't seem to let this evening go by just like every other evening. I'm embarrassed to say that I have spent more than a few New Year's Eves alone on my couch, often in tears, watching that annoying ball fall in Times Square. I think about what other people are doing and wonder why I can't be one of those lucky people with great plans. Any suggestions as to how I might get through this one?

Alone Again on New Year's

Dear Alone Again on New Year's,

Boy oh boy have you ever put some pressure on yourself!

First, you only get out of something what you put into it. Have you picked up the phone and asked any of your friends to spend the evening with you? From the sound of your letter, you are waiting patiently for nothing to happen.

Second, what about checking out ads in the papers for parties, possibly singles parties in your age group? Is it because you are uncomfortable to go alone? If that's the reason, remember that many people are there because they too didn't want to spend New Year's Eve alone.

Third, put your warmest winter attire on and head down to Nathan Phillips Square. The mood of the crowds is contagious.

Fourth, and probably your best bet, is volunteer your time. How about spending the evening with people who can't go out? Maybe in an old age home, a hospital or a hospice? I'm sure you'll find many people who could sure use a visit, especially on New Year's Eve. I'll even bet that you come out of there feeling really good, like you've started 1998 on the right foot.

So pick yourself up, dust yourself off and stop feeling sorry for yourself. Here is a chance for you to prove that you can take charge and make your own things happen.

Happy New Year.

Canada joins world effort

Nazi gold will be tracked

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Canada stands ready to help the world unravel the whereabouts of Nazi gold plundered during World War II, says a senior official of the Bank of Canada.

But at this point, Canada's contribution will be information, not cash.

The central bank sent a representative to last week's first-ever talks in London, convened to probe one of the great mysteries of the war, and the Holocaust.

The landmark three-day conference, attended by 240 delegates from 41 countries, examined Nazi gold trafficking and considered whether looted gold stocks could be used to compensate the world's estimated 300,000 Holocaust survivors.

The Bank of Canada, fresh from issuing a report that dismissed any wartime banking links between Ottawa and the Third Reich, sent its special advisor to its gold history project, Paul Cliffen, to the conference.

Also attending was an economic counsellor from Canada's high commission in London.

Tabled at the conference was the report by Carleton University history professor Duncan McDowall, which found no evidence that Nazi gold made its way into Canada [CJN, Dec. 4]

Bar-Ilan faculty backs Ne'eman

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An ad that appeared in recent editions of the Jerusalem Post and Ha'aretz is being described as a positive signal from a moderate wing of the Orthodox camp in favor of denominational compromise in Israel.

The ad was placed by 75 members of the faculty of Bar-Ilan University (BIU), the academic institution that represents the modern Orthodox stream in Israel. It affirmed the value of Jewish unity and called "on representatives of the religious establishment and representatives of non-Orthodox movements to support the compromise which appears to be emerging from the proceedings of the Ne'eman committee."

The ad goes on to say "any compromise solution must fall within the parameters of Halachah and provide formal representation to non-Orthodox movements." It is signed by the school's rector, Prof. Yehuda Friedlander, five faculty deans and 69 members of the faculty.

It referred to the committee headed by Ya'acov Ne'eman that is attempting to hammer out a compromise to forestall introduction of a Knesset bill that would make invalid non-Orthodox conversions in Israel. The committee includes members of the Reform, Conservative and Orthodox streams of Judaism.

David Weinberg, director of public relations for BIU, said the ad was a "private expression of opinion by several faculty members," though it represented the prevailing mood on campus, where 25,000 students and 1,300 faculty study.

Tax extension aids charities

OTTAWA — Jewish charities across the country are expecting to save millions of dollars thanks to the federal government's extension of the deadline for charitable donations to be considered tax credits.

Because of the postal strike, Ottawa extended the deadline from Dec. 31, to Jan. 31, 1998. That will give non-profit organizations time to make up for the virtual shutdown of donations during the strike.

For UJA Federation in Toronto, the extension is expected to mean about $3 million in additional contributions.

UJA says most charities raise between 30 and 50 percent of their annual contributions in December, and donations this month have increased dramatically.

Without the new deadline, there would have been just 18 business days for donors to receive a tax advantage for their gift.

TORONTO — Last week's news briefs stated that Ted Beavis was believed to be the first Canadian convicted for distributing hate literature under Canada's hate crimes laws. However, in 1985, Donald Andrews and Robert Smith were convicted of wilfully promoting hatred in a newsletter.

ISRAEL

Ne'eman Criticized

JERUSALEM — Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman, the key figure in the effort to resolve the religious pluralism controversy, has come under criticism by the Orthodox for addressing a conference of the Reform movement in Israel.

Ne'eman told the Nov. 27 opening session of the annual convention of the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism that the current conflict between the different streams of Judaism would be resolved "not through the courts or legislation in the Knesset, but through understanding."

Ne'eman, who heads the committee charged with finding a compromise to the religious pluralism controversy in Israel, said that all disputes between the various streams should be resolved according to Halachah, or Jewish law.

Farrakhan Visit Allowed

JERUSALEM — The leader of the Nation of Islam will not be prevented from entering Israel should he decide to visit.

But no state official will meet the Rev. Louis Farrakhan unless he apologizes for his anti-Semitic remarks and denial of the Holocaust, the Foreign Ministry decided.

The ministry said that since Farrakhan was a U.S. citizen he could enter Israel for a private visit.

WORLD

Debate Delayed

NEW YORK — The United Nations General Assembly temporarily halted discussion last week on a controversial resolution that would grant the Palestinians member status without voting privileges.

The decision to postpone the discussion was made after the Arab-sponsored proposal caused days of behind-the-scenes wrangling and it became apparent that there wasn't any widespread support for it.

The Palestinians currently have observer status at the United Nations and there is fear that any change to that status would further upset the faltering Middle East peace effort.

Jewish Judge to Help PA

SYDNEY, Australia — An Australian Jew will help the Palestinians rearrange their legal system.

The unusual pairing was created after an Australian legal group, which is headed by a prominent Jewish figure, Justice Marcus Einfeld, was appointed by the Palestinian Authority to overhaul its judicial system.

'Day of Judaism'

ROME — The Polish Catholic Church has designated Jan. 17 as an annual "Day of Judaism" in Polish churches.

The day will be dedicated to interfaith dialogue and to teaching Polish Catholics about Judaism.

The initiative, slated to involve all Roman Catholic dioceses in the country, follows the example of the Italian Catholic Church, which declared Jan. 17 an annual Day of Judaism in Italy several years ago.

Stanislaw Krajewski, Warsaw consultant for the American Jewish Committee and a Polish Jewish leader long active in interfaith relations, praised the church's initiative.

Interfaith Dialogue

SYDNEY, Australia — Representatives of Australia's Jewish community have held the first official interfaith dialogue with their counterparts from the Anglican Church.

The day-long meeting here was aimed at finding common ground and at overcoming misunderstandings between the New Zealanders rally to fight neo-Nazis

Anti-racist Rally

WELLINGTON, New Zealand — The fight against hate crime has spread to New Zealand.

The country's Jewish community, spurred by a large increase in racist attacks, hosted a rally last week in Wellington, the country's capital, with the aim of developing a strategy to stop racist groups.

One of Germany's Last War Crimes Trials

FRANKFURT — Germany has launched what may be one of its last trials of suspected war criminals.

The trial revolves around the 1942 murders of 65 Jews – including about 20 children – by a Nazi paramilitary unit in a Ukrainian village.

Ernst Hering, 75, stands charged with sealing off the village of Israelowka during the roundups and standing guard while others carried out the executions.

Although he is not accused of shooting any of the victims, prosecutors say he was aware that the goal of the roundups was to kill Jews.

Hering, who is being tried in juvenile court in Cologne because he was 19 at the time of the incident, admitted last week at the start of his trial that he was in Israelowka during the roundups of the adults, but claims he can barely remember the events.

Fifty years after the Nuremberg trials, when dozens of leading Nazi officials, doctors and judges were convicted, Hering's trial could be one of the last such trials in Germany because of the difficulty in finding witnesses from so many years ago.

It comes after decades of German prosecution of Nazi war criminals. German authorities are continuing to investigate some 4,000 suspects, according to officials.

Willie Dressen, director of the federal office charged with investigating war crimes, said that despite the problems, he remains undeterred.

U of T launches Chair in Israeli Studies

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Arab-Israeli peace process is at an impasse and it's time for the Palestinians to step up and make an offer based on a West Bank map first discussed while Yitzhak Rabin was alive, a prominent American journalist said last week.

Thomas Friedman, a two-time Pulitzer Prize winner and author of the bestseller, From Beirut to Jerusalem, was speaking at the University of Toronto as the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Chair in Israeli Studies was announced.

The Bronfmans donated $2 million to establish the chair and to provide financial support to U of T students for research and study in Israel.

The initial inspiration and driving force for the establishment of the chair was Jehudi Kinar, consul general of Israel to Toronto and western Canada.

"Fifty years after its rebirth, the miracle of modern Israel is of broad interest," said Charles Bronfman. "Andy and I are happy that students at the U of T will have the opportunity to delve into the social, political and economic revolutions that have taken place within this remarkable society."

Bronfman said he was contacted by former U of T chancellor Rose Wolfe and asked to contribute to the university. They chose to support a "unique program" that studies "a unique nation," he said.

In the lecture, which combined keen analysis, colorful anecdotes and provocative conclusions, Friedman examined various aspects of Israeli politics and Middle Eastern society.

Charles Bronfman

Though the Palestinians are the weaker party, "they have the fundamental incentive to lay their cards on the table," said Friedman, foreign affairs columnist for the New York Times. He suggested a map fashioned by former Israeli cabinet minister Yossi Beilin and Abu Mazen, Yasser Arafat's principal deputy, could serve as the foundation for furthering the peace process. The map leaves Jewish settlements in Israeli hands while giving the Palestinians most West Bank land. It leaves Jerusalem in Israeli hands while giving the Palestinians a capital, Al Quds, just outside the city's boundaries.

Advancing that sort of map will compel Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to finally indicate if he backs the Oslo process or opposes it. "For the life of me, I don't have a clue which camp he's in," Friedman said.

He suggested Netanyahu would have to forge a coalition of 75 percent of Israelis to proceed with concessions. The coalition would include "security hawks" and Labor doves who would back relinquishing 75 percent of West Bank territories. Somewhere in that formula lies the basis for a solution, he said.

Netanyahu, he continued, faces unenviable pressures. To get to the 75 percent solution, "he has to blow up his party...and that is no easy thing." Furthermore, he doesn't want peace with the Palestinians to lead to Israeli civil war. "He saw what happened to Rabin." Adding to the danger is that Netanyahu could fracture his party for an offer the other side might not accept. That's why the Palestinians should come forward with their own offer based on the Beilin-Mazen plan, he suggested.

Friedman attributed the breakdown of the peace process to several factors: Rabin's assassination; Arafat's modus vivendi; Netanyahu's fence-sitting; the Arab world's failure to modernize; and the Clinton administration's diplomatic lethargy.

A self-proclaimed "Rabinite," Friedman said the former prime minister "subscribed to a very fundamental truth: 'I don't know whether there is an Arab partner for peace with Israel. But I do know that I owe it to [Israel] to test, to go a long way to see if there is a partner.'" The alternative is to hunker down in a constant state of siege and wait for the day the Palestinians stop pining for a state of their own.

Arafat, though he may act like "a jerk" and "a moron," must face up to the fact that Oslo was coming unglued even before Rabin's assassination due to several bloody suicide bombings. His modus vivendi of trying to buy off enemies may work during war, but it doesn't during peace. Furthermore, he has not shown he understands the impact of suicide bombings on Israelis. "It's not enough to say, 'we condemn it, can we get our land back,'" Friedman said.

Netanyahu, meanwhile, appears to have had a plan to get elected but no plan of action once in power. Friedman suggested that during the last election, 50 percent of Israelis accepted Oslo as it was, while one-quarter wanted to improve it and a further 25 percent wanted to destroy the peace process entirely.

Netanyahu drew supporters from both sides of the fence, leaving observers wondering if his proposals were aimed at strengthening or killing Oslo, he said.

Meanwhile, the Arab world continues to hinder the process. "Everything is defined in the negative in the Arab world, never in the positive," Friedman said.

New Village Shul launched

TORONTO — Groundbreaking will take place on Dec. 14 for the new Village Shul, which organizers say will be the first synagogue built in Forest Hill in 50 years.

The shul, which has been housed in a storefront in the Bathurst Street/Eglinton Avenue area for seven years, was founded by five Forest Hill families in conjunction with Aish HaTorah.

The new 24,000-square-foot synagogue will be built at Eglinton and Old Park, site of an old Shell service station. Plans call for a social hall, Hebrew and preschool, and a "fireplace room," a cozy corner classroom that promises to look and feel like a Forest Hill den, so Jewish learning there will feel like a home away from home.

Opening of the $6-million facility is slated for the fall of 1998.

"The new Village Shul will be a special building, a centre of Jewish learning and celebration, where everyone, regardless of background or knowledge, can come and feel comfortable and welcomed," says Peter Friedmann, president of the synagogue's board.

Journalism a part of Jewish history

Last week in The CJN on the Perspectives page, we published an article by Lewis Levendel that accompanied a unique exhibition portraying 100 years of the Jewish Press in Canada. That exhibition is now drawing to a close at the National Library of Canada in Ottawa. Cheryl Jaffee, the curator of the priceless Lowy collection of rare Judaica and Hebraica, and the organizer of the exhibition asked me to speak at the opening of the exhibition in early November.

What follows is an excerpt from that presentation.

As Carroll Ryan, (the editor of the Jewish Times, the first Jewish newspaper to be published in Canada) so astutely observed and wrote 100 years ago, everyone in society, not only the initial targets, become the victim of hatred and bigotry. Anti-Semitism, for example, one of the oldest forms of hatred and bigotry, is therefore not just a Jewish problem, it is everyone's problem.

From that very first issue of the very first Jewish newspaper 100 years ago in Montreal, one can draw a straight line of mission and responsibility to all the Jewish newspapers that exist in Canada today.

That is one of the reasons, among very many, I feel a tremendous sense of gratitude and humility at being the editor of The CJN. I am the most recent inheritor of that responsibility. The various editors of the various Jewish newspapers who have preceded me, people like Carroll Ryan, A.M. Klein, Ralph Hyman, Maurice Lucow, Patricia Rucker, to name just a few, in the main, bore that responsibility with integrity and deep commitment for the sake of the larger good of the community and not simply for the sake of the good of their respective newspaper.

My commitment to the paper, to its readers and to the community is to do the very best I can to live up to the standards of my predecessors and to hold high the sense of responsibility and mission that was articulated in that first editorial of the Jewish Times, but which in truth, saw its first expression thousands of years earlier, when a free and law-loving nation was born out of a rabble of dispirited, disheartened and disoriented slaves.

The sense of mission and responsibility that was expressed at Sinai and that has been re-expressed in every generation is the overriding context for the work of The CJN. It finds its way in one form or another onto the pages and into the editorial room of our newspaper.

Jews are not strangers to journalism.

In a certain sense, rabbis forgive me, "journalism" in its most literal meaning, is at the very heart of our culture and tradition. The Tanach is, after all, a journal – holy to be sure – but a journal nonetheless. It is a record of the history and the teachings and the instructions of the ancient Jewish people.

We believe that its truths transcend time. They are as applicable today as they were when they were first inscribed into the hearts of our ancestors. At its least profound level, the Tanach is a journal which has been revered and studied and studied even more without cease since it first appeared.

But even after the chronology in the Tanach ends, it is true to say that this unique, divinely inspired school of "journalism" still continues to play a central, determinative role in the subsequent unfolding of Jewish history.

After the destruction of the First Temple and the return from captivity in Babylon, the sofrim, whom we know as the scribes or men of the book, or even bookmen, made certain that the journal of Jewish history would be promulgated to the entire people. They were the first to institute the instruments of communicating to the people the story, the "news," if you will, of their ancestors.

The sofrim were the forerunners of the great rabbis. The policies and traditions of the sofrim evolved into the policies and the traditions of our ancient sages, the great scholars whose far-sighted view of the future and whose immeasurable love for the Jewish people, ensured Judaism's survival unto this very day.

From Moses, to the judges, to the prophets, to the scribes, to the great rabbis: the entries into the record and into the "journal" of Jewish history ensured the collective memory and the feelings of shared destiny of the Jewish people.

The first line in the entry under Journalism in the Encyclopedia Judaica is the following: "Jews have played a major role in journalism since the early years of the profession. Publishers, editors, columnists and reporters contributed to the development of political analysis, mass circulation techniques, methods of worldwide news gathering, chain journalism and techniques that deepened the influence and impact of the written word."

Is it any wonder? Does it really surprise anyone that the people of the book, or with some deference to the poetic licence affordable this evening, the people of the "journal," the Jewish people, would be attracted to journalism?...

There is a straight line that cuts across time, that joins the Jewish Times with our prophets, the Ottawa Jewish Bulletin with our sages and The CJN with our sofrim. In fact, that straight line joins us all.

THE SIX BIGGEST MISTAKES PEOPLE MAKE WHEN MANAGING THEIR INVESTMENTS

As Canadians, we should be spending more time thinking about investments and tax strategies.

Most Canadians spend too much time worrying about their RRSP portfolios and not enough time thinking about their overall investment strategy. Remember, your RRSP is limited to $13,500 and if you are in a pension plan, your maximum is even less.

Here are some of the biggest mistakes people make when managing their investments.

5. People don't always take advantage of the methods available to legally avoid taxes.

Legal loopholes are kosher. Honest. They offer wonderful windows of opportunity for tax relief. Always remember that money denied to Revenue Canada is just as sweet as money earned. There are many financial constructs you can use to legally avoid paying taxes: Trusts, Tax Shelters, RRSPs, Limited Partnerships, The Dividend Tax Credit and the lower levels of taxation applied to Capital Gains are just a few.

6. Too many people speculate with their life savings.

While being too conservative can significantly decrease your purchasing power, people who jump into risky investments in the hopes of outlandish returns often speculate with money they can ill afford to lose. A better investment strategy is to hedge your portfolio. If you choose to place a portion of your "nest egg" in an intelligent, aggressive investment – make sure your investment portfolio is balanced by a safer growth-oriented investment; this way potential losses will never cripple your portfolio's ability to grow. It would be far too simplistic to listen to blanket statements like "the tortoises always pass the hares" or "never enter into a risky investment". There are times when you feel you need a more aggressive component in your portfolio. Just remember to hedge your bets and you are a winner even if you lose.

Sovereign Palestine solution to conflict, says Amos Oz

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A sovereign Palestine next door to a sovereign Israel will be the solution to the Arab-Jewish conflict, famed Israeli author Amos Oz told 1,100 people who packed Holy Blossom Temple recently.

Both sides will need to make compromises on their territorial demands but as far as he is concerned, "peace is about to happen."

In an optimistic overview, Oz said Arabs and Jews will live as two families in a semi-detached house, "but not as one happy family."

Though there is a rift between secular and religious Jews in Israel, it has not led to violence, he said, noting that there has not even been one incident between the two factions following the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

"When journalists ask me when there will be a civil war in Israel, I tell them that the war is already on, and has been for a long time, but it is without bloodshed."

Even the issue of conversions in Israel, a hot topic in North America, is on the way to being settled, Oz claimed.

"It is not for the state or the Knesset to decide," he said. "There will be some kind of formula under which the Orthodox will recognize Reform and Conservative rabbis up to a point. For their part, the Reform and Conservative rabbis will have to compromise on the halachic standards for conversion."

He added: "I can assure you compromise is not a dirty word, I've been married for 38 years."

Later, he said: "The dispute is not over who is a Jew, it's over who is a rabbi?"

Introduced by senior Rabbi Dow Marmur as "a prophetic voice of contemporary Israel," Oz said the chief barrier to peace has been overcome with the realization by both the Arabs and Jews that the other side will not go away.

'Compromise is not a dirty word'

"I love Israel even though at times I cannot stand it," he said.

On the other hand, he does not agree with critics who ask "Israelis to lower their voices."

"I have the right to scream at the top of my voice," he said, since Israel is a genuine "street assembly."

Although Israel is facing serious problems, "it is not the end of the world. Violence and fanaticism are dangerous, but not diversity."

For Israelis, as peace nears, Oz said "it is a bitter moment, a painful moment, it is not a wedding."

He likened the process to dangerous surgery. "I don't like the doctors, neither one of them," he said, referring to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat.

Hopes for a common market between Palestine and Israel "should wait until the divorce is over, not when the divorce is raging."

If the Arabs had not opposed the partition of Palestine in 1947 and Israelis had not been guilty of "short-sightedness" and been more generous and pragmatic in 1967, current problems could have been avoided, he said.

His talk ended a series sponsored by Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman. Reisman, in thanking Oz, said she was grateful that for the first time she had heard a speech about Israel in which compromise replaced crisis.

Rescue of Sarajevo Jews said 'touch and go'

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Israeli who led 1,000 Sarajevo Jews to safety through no man's land, from Bosnia to the Croat border, said the rescue operation was touch-and-go all the way.

At the last minute, Croatian security demands led to a seven-hour delay before the buses could get rolling, Eli Eliezri told a packed house at Petah Tikvah Congregation recently.

A short video screened before his talk showed Eliezri in the midst of tense negotiations while gunfire could be heard in the streets of Sarajevo. Frightened Jews, Muslims and Christians waited in the rescue buses that eventually made the 600 kilometre journey to the Adriatic coast on Nov. 14 and 15, 1992.

The video by the Joint Distribution Committee, which sponsored the rescue, captured the drama as Eliezri and Ivan Ceresnjes, leader of the Sarajevo Jewish centre, tried desperately to solve the impasse. Finally the buses snaked off along the airport road, the only route, as everyone held their breath, hoping snipers would give them safe passage.

After hearing Eliezri tell of the delicate negotiations, the details of which are still secret but at which no money changed hands, the rescue was termed "a historic tribute to Jewish intelligence and creativity" by co-chair of the Sephardi Network, UJA Federation, Messod Boussidan.

He said it was particularly noteworthy that the Sarajevo Jewish community played a key role in rescuing the Muslims and Christians who made up 65 percent of those on the buses.

Boussidan said that Eliezri, an ex-paratrooper in the Israeli forces, was also involved in Operation Solomon which airlifted 1,500 Ethiopian Jews to Israel

Eliezri's appearance was the first project of the Sephardi Network which was given an official welcome by Joey Steiner, UJA Federation president.

Co-chair Jacques Sayegh, whose father once lived in Sarajevo, said Sephardi Jews are active in the UJA Federation drive for funds and in helping to organize events honoring Israel on its 50th anniversary.

The UJA Federation campaign has passed the $31 million mark on its way to the goal of $60 million, Sayegh said. Because of the postal srike coming at a critical, time in the campaign, UJA telethons will be held between Dec. 7 and 17.

"A united community is one that cares for each other," said vice-chair Carlos Laredo, Peth Tikvah president, uging suport of the Federation campaign.

Eliezri, a second generation sabra, who lives near Tel Aviv, is visiting Toronto for the first time. He charmed the large audience with his off-the-cuff, informal account of events in Sarajevo.

Fun in learning called important tool in assimilation fight

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Letting youngsters have fun in a Jewish atmosphere will do wonders to counter assimilation, according to Rabbi Daniel Bahar. He just founded the Jewish Youth Learning Centre to prove that very point.

"Just by going fishing, by seeing that the rabbi brings a book along, does wonders," he said.

Kids learn Judaism "by osmosis" that way, he said. "If you push [observance] on people they won't come back."

He believes strongly that you have to "love people for themselves, not for how religious they are or become."

Rabbi Bahar and his wife Esther have been involved in kiruv, outreach, for at least 15 years. Their efforts include working with Russian immigrants here and in Israel, a Jewish Boys Shul Club (and an associated Jewish Girls Shul Club), and a Just One Shabbat program, where youngsters came to the Bahars' home to experience a traditional Shabbat.

As youth director at Shaarei Shomayim, he introduced such innovations as a Teen Shul Club, a Kung Fu program and simchah dancing.

One popular program the Bahars sponsored was a Saturday night coffee house in their home, where young adults could meet, have great food, enjoy music and generally have fun in a Jewish atmosphere.

This program is continuing on an irregular basis, sometimes at their new home in the Bathurst-Rockford area and sometimes at other locations.

The new centre opened last June, and so far, programs are geared for grades 5 to junior high and to university students and young adults. Rabbi Bahar hopes to begin programming for teenagers soon.

There is a computer, with various learning programs; the Miracle Piano System, where you can learn keyboard by computer; facilities for arts and crafts; a sitting area for lounging; and a small library, which has books on subjects from theology, prayer and history to general works on such subjects as fishing and techniques of learning.

The rabbi has organized go-cart expeditions, fishing trips, and an after-Shabbat coffee house with music and a mystic rabbi. He is planning a Chanukah retreat at Maple Lake. Plans are underway for hay rides, horseback riding, Shabbatonim, parties, laser games, camping and educational activities.

The Jewish Youth Learning Centre is a membership free, non-profit organization.

Home care a federal priority, Rock tells UJA

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Home health care – long advocated within the Jewish community, especially for the elderly – is high on the federal government's agenda, says federal health minister Allan Rock.

Canada's health care system must be reformed to help more and more people who are forced to care for a family member at home, often with no insurance, Rock told a UJA Federation gathering last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Provincial medicare programs have not kept up with the huge growth in home care, the minister pointed out.

And the Canada Health Act, passed in 1984, did not foresee the boom in home health care, he added.

"If properly delivered, [home care] could work toward achieving better quality of life while saving a significant amount of money," Rock told about 150 members of UJA's Physicians' Division.

Rock said he will convene a national conference in March to examine ways to "standardize home care issues." Physicians, he said, "must be listened to" on the matter.
